The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Delaware that the President pro tempore of the Senate decided at the last sitting of the Senate upon the question of order that was raised, which was that this amendment was not general legislation. The question of relevancy if raised—and any Senator has a right to raise it—must be submitted to the Senate under the rule, and the Senator from Delaware now raising the question of relevancy, the Chair will submit that question to the Senate for its decision.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask the Chair to submit that question.

Mr. HALE. I only wish to say a single word upon that point. Undoubtedly the Chair has ruled correctly that at any stage——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would state to the Senator from Maine that by unanimous consent of course any suggestion upon the question pending may be received.

Mr. HALE. I was only going to make a suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unless there be objection the Senator will proceed.

Mr. HALE. I shall take up no time. I think hardly any Senator would on the question of relevancy to the subject-matter of the bill—appropriations for the Navy—be prepared to vote that this is not relevant. Appropriation bills have heretofore been loaded with general legislation entirely distinct and apart from the Departments for which they are made; but that an appropriation for new ships for the Navy is not relevant to an appropriation bill for the Navy seems to me to be a proposition that very few Senators on reflection would vote for. So I am content that the vote may be taken at once on that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Is the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations relevant to the bill? Senators regarding it as relevant will say "ay;" those of the contrary opinion, "no." [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARLAND (when his name was called). I am usually paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], who is detained on account of sickness. I suppose he would vote "yea" if present. I shall vote "yea" myself.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. COCKRELL. My colleague [Mr. VEST] is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. My colleague has been called home by necessary business, and will be absent for some days. I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON].

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER] is paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON].

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 14; as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate decides that the amendment is relevant. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. McPHERSON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BROWN. Let the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read if desired. The Chair will state to the Senator from Georgia that the amendment is about one hundred lines, and has been fully reported. Does the Senator desire the amendment reported?

Mr. BROWN. I withdraw the request.

Mr. BAYARD. It is scarcely necessary for me to repeat that I was and am in favor of the increase of the Navy proposed in the bill of which this amendment is a copy; but I am not in favor of ingrafting that measure in this form on an appropriation bill, and therefore I shall vote against it.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I desire to say, sir, that this subject does not present the difficulty to my mind that it seems to do to some Senators. In my position on the Naval Committee I have had an opportunity, as I stated before, of ascertaining the necessities of this branch of the public service, and I made up my mind that in any way that I could vote to add a new ship to the Navy I would do it. The mere form of this thing does not matter to me. I have voted to concur with the House of Representatives in adding measures to appropriation bills. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds propose appropriations for buildings time after time, and after they are proposed they are referred to the Committee on Appropriations to provide the money. It has been done here over and over. The appropriation made a few years ago for the improvement of my own navy-yard first had to pass through the Naval Committee and then go to the Committee on Appropriations before it could go through the body. This is substantially that proposition, and as a friend of the new Navy I am not going to permit any technicality to stand in the way of voting for it when I feel that the country demands it and the interests of the public service require it.

It is said that the rules of the Senate will be violated. I do not see it. The rule expressly provides for this case, and I can not conceive of any party question involved here. A few years ago I staid here day after day to sustain the action of the other body that had ingrafted legislation on appropriation bills and had repealed every obnoxious feature in our election code. My vote is on record, and my speech is there, in which I justified the House in ingrafting upon an appropriation bill a provision to sweep out of existence every obnoxious law relating to elections that was then on the statute-book. And am I going to stultify myself now with respect to a provision that looks to nothing but the appropriation of a few million dollars to add a few ships to the Navy after having made the record that I did make to support the House of Representatives in 1879—am I going to take the high ground that I can not give a few dollars to the Navy because it is distinct legislation?

As I said before, this is a proposition to give to the President of the United States the authority to do this thing. On him I shall throw the responsibility. Everybody admits the wants of the Navy. So far as concerns the obnoxious fact that these vessels are to be "commerce-destroyers," I understand there is nothing meant by that but that if war should happen they shall stand as a menace to France and to England, not to compete with their ironclads or their great ships of war, but to make seizures of their private vessels on the high seas according to the laws and customs of nations.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator did not misunderstand me to say that I objected to that?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. No.

Mr. BAYARD. I only said it was a very odious term for me to hear attached to an American man-of-war.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I insist that all that was meant by "commerce-destroyer" was that so far as commerce was a benefit to the enemy it would be destroyed, but not by the torch, not by destruction on the high seas, but by legitimate seizure and condemnation according to the usages of nations. That I say it is perfectly legitimate for this nation to do: to put upon the ocean fifty fast vessels, if necessary, so that England may understand that she can not go to war with the United States with impunity and maintain at the same time her commercial marine, about which so much has been said here.

There is a strong public sentiment in this country, Mr. President, both Democratic and Republican, in favor of a navy; there is no question of party here; and I think I may say that I am better serving my party when I take the ground that I do to-day and indicate to the country that I am willing to vote in any way I can in order to add to the efficiency of our public force.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY]. If he were here, I should vote "nay" and he would vote "yea."

Mr. CAMDEN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

Mr. DAWES (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY]. I should vote "yea" on this amendment and he would vote "nay."

Mr. HILL (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. COKE (when Mr. MAXEY's name was called). My colleague [Mr. MAXEY] has been called home on business and will be absent several days. During his absence he is paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES].

Mr. VOORHEES (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay," and I presume he would vote "yea." My colleague [Mr. VEST] is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. My colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I am paired on all political questions with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. I should like to inquire of his colleague if he considers this a political question on which I should observe my pair?

Mr. CAMDEN. My colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. MILLER, of New York. That being the case, I will say that if the Senator were present I should vote "yea."

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY].

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 18; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 476, to insert:

For procuring tools and otherwise preparing for the construction of iron or steel ships, $150,000, the same to be expended in fitting for construction of the hulls of such ships such navy yard or yards as may be deemed most advantageous to prepare and use for such work.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 483, after the word "dollars," to insert "to be immediately available;" so as to make the clause read:

For completing the Mohican at the Mare Island navy-yard, $50,000, to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was stated to be to strike out from line 484 to line 487, inclusive, as follows:

For care and safe-keeping of the iron-clad monitors now in the hands of the contractors when they shall have been turned over to the Government by said contractors, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I think that amendment ought to go as part of the next one, because if the Senate fails to agree to the amendment proposed to be inserted by the committee this clause of the House bill ought to remain. I think the Senate will agree in all probability to the amendment offered by the committee, but until that is done, I suggest to the Senator from Maine who has charge of the bill whether this ought not to be treated as part of that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the next succeeding amendment as printed.

Mr. HALE. It was intended to substitute the next succeeding printed amendment for the clause just read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the amendment is to strike out and insert.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so reported. The amendment is to strike out the words just read and to insert in lieu thereof what will now be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lieu of the words proposed to be stricken out, the Committee on Appropriations propose to insert:

For continuing work upon the double-turreted monitors, $2,000,000, the same to be applied toward procuring the side and turret armor and armament and finishing the vessels; and the Secretary of the Navy, acting under the advice of the naval advisory board, in the same manner in all respects as in the construction of the steel cruisers, shall not, in procuring such armor and armament and finishing the monitors, exceed as the total cost of such completion the amounts estimated in the report of the board of October 25, 1883, and the report of the Secretary of December 1, 1883; and in all purchases of armor or contracts for construction there shall be free and open public competition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment as now reported to strike out and insert.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out from line 502 to line 506, inclusive, as follows:

Naval line officers may be detailed as instructors in mathematics or other branches of learning in any schools or colleges, according to the act of February 26, 1859; but the total number of all naval officers so detailed shall not exceed forty.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the committee why that is stricken out?

Mr. HALE. Mainly because it is clearly a provision of legislation changing the law as it stands now, and the committee did not deem it advisable to incorporate it into the bill. It went out with other matters which the Senator must have noticed.

Mr. HOAR. If it is put on that ground I will not make any controversy; but I simply wish to say that it is a very sensible and useful provision. There are a great many institutions in this country which are now giving instruction in steam-engineering and in construction, and the people whom they educate would be of great service and great assistance to the country in the case of a naval war requiring a sudden expansion of our naval strength. While I do not wish to controvert the principle on which the committee have acted in striking out this clause, I desire to say that I hope the committee will find an opportunity to enlarge the power now possessed by the Secretary of the Navy in this direction hereafter.

Mr. HALE. The authority comprehends engineering officers now.

Mr. HOAR. I am aware of that; it comprehends all officers under the rank of lieutenant now, whether engineer officers or not, as I understand.

Mr. PLUMB. It ought to be understood, I think, in regard to this provision that it does not limit the detail of engineer officers to engineering or construction; that the purport of it was to permit the detail of officers of the Navy other than engineers for the teaching of mathematics and things of that kind, which they can not do better than anybody else. It would be, I think, vicious to extend this idea of detailing naval officers to others than those possessing proficiency in some special branch which could not be taught by the ordinary professors in colleges, which is certainly not true of mathematics.

While the Senator from Maine says the action of the committee was because this provision was legislation, the vote which I gave for striking it out did not depend on that proposition of it at all, but it was because I regard the legislation proposed as vicious in itself. The present law permits the detail of officers of engineers to teach those branches which can not be taught by an ordinary instructor. This only gives the privilege of teaching mathematics in addition.

Mr. HOAR. There are many officers who are in the line and above the rank of lieutenant who would be exceedingly useful in this branch of instruction, and whose pupils might render great service to the country in the case of a naval war requiring the improvisation of a large naval force. While the criticism which the Senator from Kansas makes on this clause of the bill as framed is entirely sound, yet I think it would be better to limit the bill so as to cover the grounds of the objection which the Senator from Kansas has suggested if we were proceeding to legislate on this subject at all.

Mr. PLUMB. But the law as it now stands permits the detail of engineers for the purpose of teaching steam-engineering in colleges, and this is intended to enlarge that so as to permit the detail of naval officers to teach mathematics. If it is desirable to increase the number of engineers who may be detailed for the purpose of teaching their special branch of proficiency, that is one thing.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator remembers that last year or the year before last we abolished the special education of cadet-engineers, and all our officers now are educated alike, as I understand, at Annapolis.

Mr. PLUMB. That will not apply to the existing establishment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations striking out from lines 502 to 506, inclusive.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Marine Corps," after the word "dollars," in line 617, to strike out the following clause:

And from and after the passage of this act there shall be no appointments, except by promotion, to fill vacancies occurring in the list of commissioned officers of the Marine Corps until the number of such officers shall have been reduced, by casualties or otherwise, below seventy-five; and after the number of officers shall be reduced as above provided, the whole number of commissioned officers on the active-list in the Marine Corps shall not exceed seventy-five.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out section 3, in the following words:

SEC. 3. That no officer whose name is borne on the retired-list of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps shall hold position in the civil service or other employment of the Government, and draw the salary or compensation thereof, together with his pay as a retired officer of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps: Provided, That any such retired officer accepting a position in the civil service or other employment of the Government may, at the time of acceptance, elect to take the salary of such position or in lieu to retain his pay as a retired officer: Provided further, But the restrictions of this section shall not apply to any officer below the rank of major in the Army or Marine Corps, or commander in the Navy, who has been retired by reason of wounds received in the service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. HALE. There are certain amendments that are mainly formal that I would call attention to. In line 76, after the word "care," I move to insert "and fittings;" so as to read:

Care and fittings of library.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. In line 81, after the word "instruction," I move to insert "professional journals;" so as to read:

Reports, professional investigation, cost of special instruction, professional journals, and information from abroad, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. In line 194, I move to insert, after "coal," the words "or other fuel."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent that amendment can be incorporated, it being a proposition to amend an amendment already agreed to. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. HALE. In line 198, after "coal," I move to insert "and of other fuel."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That also must be done by unanimous consent. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. HALE. In line 199, after "coal," I move to insert "or other fuel."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. HALE. In line 392, after the word "tons," where it occurs the second time in that line, I move to insert, in order to make the clause clear, "this boat;" so as to read:

Not to exceed nine hundred tons, this boat to be built on plans and specifications, &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to this amendment? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. HALE. In line 446, I move to strike out "and their armament;" so as to read:

And for the construction of all which vessels the Secretary of the Navy shall invite proposals, &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to this amendment?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill the necessity or apparent necessity for striking that out.

Mr. HALE. The Senator will see himself that when propositions are made for the ships there are certain provisions that ship-yards may have in readiness, but they have nothing to do with the armament. The armament does not go into the bid for constructing the vessels. That is entirely separate and distinct.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I do not see that it makes any difference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the amendment? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine the result of striking out those words in line 446, whether it will not have the effect of removing the armament of these vessels entirely from any range of competition and leave the matter in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy without any limit whatever as to the method he shall pursue in the purchase of the armament of these ships?

Mr. HALE. The Senator will see that this is the clause that provides that before constructing the ships proposals shall be invited from American ship-builders, who must show that their yards are or will be equipped to the extent necessary for construction. It will throw out a large portion of the ship-builders if you oblige them to show that they have their yards ready for the building of the armament. The point is simply that you can not ask ship-builders to agree that they will build guns or that they will have their yards ready to build guns. That is why I have moved to strike out those words, and they have been stricken out.

There are one or two other amendments which I wish to make, which I gave notice of the other day. The first is in relation to the gun-foundery and the other in relation to the gun-factory.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first amendment indicated by the Senator from Maine will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of line 382 it is proposed to insert:

For the purchase and erection of plant for casting, forging, rough-boring, and tempering guns up to one hundred tons, ready for delivery at gun-factories, including cost of the process of liquid compression, if adopted, $835,000.

Mr. BECK. I make the point that that is new legislation.

Mr. HALE. I should hardly think that that point is well taken. We have appropriated all through the bill, under the proper bureaus, for the construction of guns, for ordnance, and this is simply to perfect methods by which it may be done. I will say, however, to the Senator from Kentucky that if he will withdraw his point of order I shall withdraw the amendment. I do not urge it, but will only urge the adoption of the amendment providing for the gun-factory, believing that the forgings, the tubes, the jackets, the rings can be, as the gun board conclude in their report, built by private enterprise, which should be encouraged. Therefore I do not urge the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky withdraw his question of order?

Mr. BECK. No, sir; I do not desire to withdraw anything.

Mr. HALE. I am willing to withdraw the amendment if the point of order is withdrawn.

Mr. BECK. Of course, then, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. HALE. I withdraw the amendment. Now let the next amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. After line 382 it is proposed to insert:

For plant for gun-factory for completing guns from 6-inch caliber to 16-inch caliber, including buildings and shrinking-pit, $900,000.

Mr. BECK. I desire something in that direction done, and I do not really know but what the Senator from Delaware has a proposition which I should be very glad to have submitted. I desire something of that sort done, but I desire it done with more care than can be given in this bill, perhaps.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator make a point of order?

Mr. BECK. Not now.

Mr. BAYARD. The amendment of the Senator from Maine is in the line of a proposition which I entirely approve, and that is that the Government of the United States should, after this very long interval of neglect, commence the preparation of some facilities for the construction of modern artillery. I have read with some interest and care the report of the gun-foundery board to which my attention was directed by the Senator from Maine, to be found in House Executive Document No. 97 of the present session. I have read it carefully, and it seems to be most intelligently stated. The result of their recommendations is in some degree embodied in the two amendments presented by the Senator from Maine; but he has not presented them subject to the conditions that the board recommend. At page 47 of the report, after criticising the English, the French, and the Russian systems of constructing artillery, they state the conclusions of the board, as follows:

The conclusions of the board on this subject accord with the plain teachings of these historical instances. It accepts the system now pursued in France as the proper standard for imitation, and recommends that in inaugurating the manufacture of war material in our own country a conformity as close as circumstances will admit to the plans which have proved so successful in France should be observed.

The plan in France was this:

As an example of depending alone on government works France was a perfect instance before the Franco-German war. During the period referred to the government founderies were the sole source of supply of the armament of the country; the officers charged with the work formed a close corporation; their action was never exposed to the public; their ideas were never subjected to criticism; the ingenuity and inventive talent of the country were ignored and resisted, and no precaution was thought necessary to provide a supply in case of need of rearmament. The result is well known; a great crisis came; the government works were inadequate to meet the additional demands made upon them, and the patriotic efforts of private establishments were inadequate to produce all the material that was needed. How entirely France has now altered her system is shown in a previous part of this report; her present practice is theoretically perfect, and it has proved to be practically efficient. Her government establishments are still retained, but as gun-factories simply, in which the parts are machined and assembled, but for foundery work she depends upon the private industries of the country, and many of these works have found it to their profit to establish gun-factories which supplement the government factories to a great extent.

That makes the recommendations of the board obviously wise, and the Government by having gun-factories of its own as well as other plant for making the raw material will never be subject to extortion by private contractors, because unless they shall propose to do their work upon fair terms the Government will have the ability to turn to its own facilities and prevent its suffering at their hands.

On page 50, however, we come to the conclusion of the report signed by this foundery board. They state the cost of casting, forging (hydraulic press), which it seems by the late experience is preferred to the steam-hammer process of forging, rough-boring, and turning, and tempering, and the approximate cost of plant for gun-factories to be found in this document, the one at $775,000 and the other at $900,000. But they say:

Three years will be required to complete the tools, construct the shops, and establish the plant. Such a factory will be able to turn out per year fifty 6-inch, seventeen 12-inch, and twelve 16-inch guns, or a proportionally larger number of smaller calibers, at a yearly expense of about $2,000,000. The figures can not be pronounced exact, but the board is confident that they closely approximate accuracy. The calculations are based upon estimates obtained abroad, and do not include ocean freight and customs dues.

The facts that the United States is destitute of the means of fabricating the modern guns so urgently needed for national defense, and that at least three years will be required to complete the tools, construct the shops, and establish the plant, would seem to demand an immediate appropriation of the amount ($1,800,000) estimated for the establishment of the proposed gun-factories.

That is to be the total cost of these two establishments which have been suggested by the amendment of the Senator from Maine. It is obvious that if three years are required installments of one-third of the amount stated should ratably be appropriated as time goes on. But, sir, there ought to be something more before this money is appropriated; there ought to be something more than mere approximation. There can be and there ought to be an examination, and a detailed examination, and drawings and estimates, in order to ascertain how much of this $2,000,000 in round numbers will be needed in each year to commence and carry on economically the proposed structures.

I am strongly in favor of this appropriation when we have put it under the proper restrictions under estimates in detail; and it is a strange thing that it has been so long delayed. It is proper that it should be immediately commenced, and economy will dictate that preparation for the commencement is essential. We must know more about it than we can in this way and by this amendment. I ask to have read for information that which I would propose as a substitute for these two amendments; but I apprehend that both the amendments will be withdrawn by the Senator from Maine, because they are not in order on this bill. The point has been suggested by the Senator from Kentucky as to one, and it will be as to the other, for it was only withdrawn to allow an explanation. If the Senator will allow my proposition to be read perhaps he will agree with me in permitting this amendment, which appropriates no money, but directs examination to be made, to be incorporated in the bill.

Mr. HALE. I presume the Senator and I will come to an accord on this matter, because we are seeking a common end. I have already withdrawn one amendment, and only the second one now remains. I shall be glad to hear what the Senator proposes.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask that my amendment be read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Delaware proposed as a substitute will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy, with the assistance of the naval advisory board, appointed in conformity with the act approved August 5, 1882, to report to Congress on the first day of the next ensuing session a plan and estimate for the preparation and purchase of plant for a gun-factory to complete guns from 6-inch caliber to 16-inch caliber, including buildings and shrinking-pit; also for purchase and preparation of plant for castings, forgings, rough-boring, and tempering guns up to one hundred tons ready for delivery at gun-factories, including machinery for liquid compression; and to report the full and detailed estimates for the cost of the work aforesaid, and whether the same can be better and more economically performed in establishments owned by the Government or by private contract, or by a combined system whereby the said work can be accomplished partly by the Government and partly by private contract, and in what annual installments the said appropriation can most economically be made.

Mr. HALE. So far as I see, I am entirely willing to withdraw the other amendment and accept this amendment that has been submitted, or will be, by the Senator from Delaware. It is in the line of a more complete investigation of this important subject. The gun board does not believe in the Government erecting what is provided for in the second part of the Senator's amendment, but he has well provided in that for the whole question to be considered. The report that we get under this will, if anything can, throw additional light. And directly in point here I ask that there may be printed in the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of the Navy on this subject, inclosing a letter to him from Admiral Simpson, who was at the head of the gun-foundery board.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the letters will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The letters are as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, April 10, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose a copy of a letter from Rear-Admiral Edward Simpson, president of the gun-foundery board, relative to the amendments proposed by you to the naval appropriation bill for providing means for the manufacturing within the United States of material for heavy cannon and for the fabrication of naval guns from such material. I concur with the board in advising that private works should be induced to produce the necessary steel by contracts involving a fixed annual appropriation continued for a series of years, and that the guns should be fabricated at Government factories.

As the subject is novel and any appropriations for these objects will be large, I recommend that there be added a requirement that the sums shall be expended only with the assistance and advice of a board appointed by the President after confirmation by the Senate, three members of which at least shall consist of naval officers.

Very respectfully,

WM. E. CHANDLER,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. EUGENE HALE,
Acting Chairman Naval Committee, United States Senate.

NAVAL ADVISORY BOARD, Washington, April 9, 1884.

SIR: Referring to an amendment to the naval appropriation bill "reported for information" by Senator HALE in the Senate, which provides for the manufacture of metal for cannon at Government expense, I ask your attention to the following conclusions arrived at on this subject by the gun-foundery board:

The board concluded that the Government should fabricate the guns at gun-factories.

The board concluded that the manufacture of the material, including casting, forging, rough-boring and turning, and tempering should be done by private works.

The amendment reported yesterday is opposed to the mature conclusions of the board, which desired this encouragement given to the private industries of the country.

In order to encourage this outlay of private funds, the board proposed a permanent appropriation (similar to that for supplying arms to the militia) for "providing the country with modern artillery." This appropriation would be a guarantee against loss to those who undertake the work.

The proposals of the board would thus involve—

1. Nine hundred thousand dollars for the establishment of a complete Government gun-factory for the Navy.

This includes the fabrication of guns of the largest calibers. So far as the Navy is concerned, the plant for guns from 12-inch to 16-inch calibers might be omitted at present; guns up to 12-inch caliber is all we will require for some time. This would reduce the amount of the appropriation to $550,000.

2. To keep the full plant, including that for 16-inch caliber, busy (producing fifty 6-inch, seventeen 12-inch, and twelve 16-inch guns yearly) a permanent yearly appropriation of $2,000,000 will be required. Leaving out the guns from 12 to 16 inch calibers would reduce the amount about one-half, say to $1,000,000.

If half of this amount be estimated for labor at the gun-factory and half for purchase of material, the private manufacturers will have the guarantee of $500,000 yearly to remunerate them for the expense of putting up a plant for preparing the material for guns for the Navy alone.

I would recommend as a substitute for the amendment referred to the following:

"For the purpose of providing modern artillery for the Navy of the United States, for the purpose of encouraging in the United States the manufacture of material suitable for modern artillery, and for the purpose of establishing a guarantee against loss to those manufacturers in the United States who will undertake the manufacture of suitable material, $1,000,000, to be a permanent yearly appropriation to be expended under the authority of the President for the specific purposes cited.

"For plant for gun-factory for completing guns embracing all calibers up to twelve inches, including buildings and shrinking-pit, $550,000."

I feel confident with such a guarantee the material for cannon will be forthcoming from our own steel-works. I believe that the Cambria Works at Johnstown would entertain the idea seriously and at once.

Very respectfully,

E. SIMPSON,
Rear-Admiral, United States Navy, President of the Gun-Foundery Board.

Hon. W. E. CHANDLER,
Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. HALE. I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Maine is withdrawn.

Mr. BAYARD. Now I offer my amendment, to which I understand there is no objection.

Mr. HALE. I hope no objection will be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, which has been read.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, while I agree in the general view of the Senator from Delaware and of the Senator from Maine who has charge of this bill, I do not think the amendment now suggested by the Senator from Delaware is exactly what we should adopt in this regard.

At the last session of Congress we appointed a joint commission consisting of Army officers and naval officers whose duty it was to examine this whole question of guns, and they have made their report, which the Senator from Delaware has read from. That examination was exhaustive in its character. If we are to build up a system of defenses through the Navy and through our fortifications, it seems to me that in any investigation we make on this subject we should unite both the Army and the Navy. What can the Secretary of the Navy and this advisory board do that has not already been done? What can they do to furnish us additional light on this question?

Mr. BAYARD. They can utilize every particle of the information found by this joint board. The board has already recommended two of these establishments, one at the Washington navy-yard for the Navy and the other at West Point for the Army; but they are mere recommendations as to a general plan; they are not sufficiently specific or detailed to permit any man in charge of private money or public money to make an expenditure upon such a report as is now before us.

It is true, for they themselves have recommended it, that the Army should have its own foundery, and that the Navy should have its own establishment, because if there were a mingling of jurisdiction there would be confusion among the officers. That is all well enough. I think that everything asked for in the amendment is necessary for the Army, and I believe it is necessary for the Navy, and I think it ought to be provided for as to each. They both touch the question of the Government providing establishments of its own for the creation of war material of a modern character.

My amendment was intended certainly to provide, and I think the Senator from Iowa upon examination will find that it provides for such a detailed report as will enable us economically to make those appropriations that shall give the Government, in this case for the Navy only (in some other bill I trust it will be for the Army also separately), a workshop of its own that will place it beyond the power of extortion by private parties.

Mr. HALE. Another feature struck me as valuable in the amendment suggested by the Senator from Delaware, which the gun-foundery board have not gone into, and that is the investigation which could be reported to us in December as to the capacity of private establishments in this country to do a part of this work. The gun-foundery board did not go into that.

Mr. ALLISON. We all know perfectly well that there is not a private establishment in the United States to-day which can do this work.

Mr. HALE. Has the Senator read the letters from the Cambria Iron Works that have just come into the Department, and others, showing the condition they are in and how little expense they would be at in order to make these founderies?

Mr. ALLISON. I have read those letters, and I undertake to say that if we enter upon a system of defense with reference to our Army and our Navy, we shall very soon find men in this country who are enterprising enough and energetic enough, and who have the means, to furnish all the plant necessary for the making of the steel and the forgings with which to build these guns. I do not want any information myself upon that question. I agree with the gun-foundery board that it is not wise for this Government to undertake to manufacture steel from ores and to undertake the great business of manufacturing guns from the ores of our country.

Mr. BAYARD. There is nothing of that kind suggested in this amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. It is suggested that the Secretary of the Navy and the advisory board inquire into that. We have already had one board who have inquired into that, and they report against it.

Mr. BAYARD. Is the Senator not in error?

Mr. ALLISON. Then I have not read correctly the amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator is in error. He will find that the amendment relates only to the items to be found on page 50 of the report of the gun-foundery board.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the latter clause of the amendment may be read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the latter part of the amendment again.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And to report full and detailed estimates for the cost of the work aforesaid, and whether the same can be better and more economically performed in establishments owned by the Government, or by private contract, or by a combined system whereby the said work can be accomplished partly by the Government and partly by private contract, and in what annual installments the said appropriation can most economically be made.

Mr. ALLISON. That does not cover the point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk had better report the whole amendment.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy, with the assistance of the naval advisory board, appointed in conformity with the act approved August 5, 1882, to report to Congress on the first day of the next ensuing session a plan and estimate for the preparation and purchase of plant for a gun-factory to complete guns from 6-inch caliber to 16-inch caliber, including buildings and shrinking-pit; also for purchase and preparation of plant for castings, forgings, rough-boring, and tempering guns up to one hundred tons ready for delivery at gun-factories.

Mr. ALLISON. That is all I desire to have read. I think we have satisfactory evidence in the report of the gun-foundery board that it is not wise for the Government to enter into the business of manufacturing steel for guns.

Mr. HALE. Let the Senator strike out that part of the amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. The amendment does not provide for the manufacture of steel for guns.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I do not understand the amendment.

Mr. HALE. Let that part be stricken out.

Mr. BAYARD. They can utilize any information. Let the amendment be modified by striking out that part of it, if the Senator thinks it covers that; but I really do not think it does, for I have copied this——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator suggest the language to be stricken out?

Mr. HALE. That part in relation to the founderies.

Mr. ALLISON. The board has already reported against this.

Mr. BAYARD. The question is stated at page 50 of the report: "approximate cost of plant for producing the tempered parts of guns up to one hundred tons, ready for delivery at gun-factory;" and then they go on to give the items of that cost. It is entirely competent for the Government to make provision for that, in my judgment, when we know the details and the expense of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk will report the modification suggested by the Senator from Iowa.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out the following words:

Also for purchase and preparation of plant for castings, forgings, rough-boring, and tempering guns up to one hundred tons ready for delivery at gun-factories, including machinery for liquid compression.

Mr. ALLISON. In other words, what I desire is that this examination and investigation shall relate wholly to the manufacture of guns by the Government, and not to the manufacture of raw material for use as guns.

Mr. HALE. Forgings?

Mr. ALLISON. For forgings.

Mr. BAYARD. With due respect to my friend from Iowa, I think he is cutting too deeply in this matter, and that he is excluding information; for this is only information. It binds Congress to no appropriation. But the Government of the United States ought to be able to make a gun itself.

Mr. ALLISON. From the ore?

Mr. BAYARD. That does not make it from the ore. It never will be run from the ore in this case. I know that you now can convert iron ore into steel by a single process; there is no doubt of that. It is not proposed, as I understand, that the Government should manufacture steel, but it is to have the founderies in which guns can be cast from steel purchased or made elsewhere.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Delaware will bear with me. I have myself given some examination to this subject, and I have some opinions respecting it. What I desire to provide against is that this Government shall undertake the business of manufacturing the material from which steel guns are made.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator from Iowa yield for a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. McPHERSON. Does the Senator from Iowa think that Herr Krupp, who is a large manufacturer of guns in Westphalia, would permit any manufacturer on earth to supply him with the material that he puts into his guns? In other words, would he go into the market and buy such material as he could purchase upon the market and manufacture his guns, which require of course that they should bear tremendous strain and tension, in preference to making the material himself, and then knowing when the material was ready to put in the gun that it would perform all that was demanded of it?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know what Mr. Krupp would do. I have no doubt he would much prefer to make his entire plant, including the steel and every raw material that goes into the making of a gun; but I know that there is not a government on earth to-day that manufactures the steel from which guns are made. Great Britain does not do it; France does not do it. They all purchase their forgings, their steel, their castings, and build up their guns.

Mr. McPHERSON. Nearly all purchase the gun itself.

Mr. ALLISON. Many of them purchase also the guns. France makes some guns, but purchases others.

What I desire is simply to confine this investigation to what I think we ought to do, namely, providing a plant whereby we can take the raw material of steel and from it build up such guns as we wish to use in our Navy and in our Army.

Mr. BAYARD. Will my friend suggest a modification of the amendment? I have entirely the same object in view. I have no idea of the Government going into the manufacture of steel, but I have an idea of their going into the manufacture of guns from steel.

Mr. ALLISON. So have I. The Senator and I have no difference on that point.

Mr. BAYARD. If the Senator so modifies the amendment as to answer that purpose, I shall be perfectly satisfied.

Mr. MILLER, of California. There is not any doubt about the amendment. It does not include the manufacture of steel.

Mr. ALLISON. It includes the castings.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Taking the pig-iron and castings does not include making pig-iron. It says, "also for purchase and preparation of plant for castings, forgings, rough-boring, and tempering guns up to one hundred tons." The use of pig-iron or iron in its first base of manufacture to be cast and forged has no reference to the manufacture of iron or steel from the ore.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will bear with me, this steel is now cast by what is known as the open-hearth process from the ores, and is cast in one single piece, requiring a casting certainly as high as fifty tons for a hundred-ton gun; much larger perhaps. That can be done at any steel establishment that has the plant prepared for it. I have no doubt the Cambria Iron Works, with an expenditure of $50,000, could manufacture these castings (and the rough-boring of course is still another process) for guns say 10 or 10½ inches in diameter. But when it comes to a 16-inch gun, of course there must be immenselylarger castings in order to cast into one single piece. For that reason I think that we had better allow our own steel manufacturers to grow up into this business. We are not likely to build a 16-inch gun within the next year or the next two years, at least not more than one or two of them.

I do not believe there are to-day in the world twenty-five 100-ton guns. It is a rare thing indeed that those guns are cast either for the army or for the navy, for fortification, or to be put upon ships. Therefore I do not believe it is necessary for us to rush into a plant which will include the construction of 16-inch guns. Our manufacturers of steel will grow up into this business as rapidly as we desire them to grow. We are building now 6, 8, and 10 inch guns. By the time we get ready to build 16-inch guns our steel manufacturers will be ready to furnish the castings and also the machinery for rough-boring those guns.

Therefore it was that I ventured to suggest to my friend from Delaware that we should confine this examination and investigation and this expenditure for the present to the creation of a plant, not for the manufacture of material for guns, but for the manufacture of the guns themselves; and that is exactly what the gun-foundery board recommend and nothing else.

Mr. McPHERSON. What is the objection to making the inquiry thorough? What is the objection to inquiring into it? I understand that the amendment is only one of inquiry.

Mr. ALLISON. There is no objection whatever, except that the gun-foundery board, consisting of Army officers and Navy officers, have already made the inquiry, and it is absolutely impossible to make that inquiry thoroughly unless the officers shall visit Europe. How can the naval advisory board go over the inquiry made by the gun-foundery board unless they themselves make a journey to Europe? The gun-foundery board at the expense of the Government went to Europe and spent the summer there visiting every foundery and every great establishment for the manufacture of guns except Krupp's, and they were not permitted to visit Mr. Krupp's establishment. Are we to repeat that by sending this naval advisory board to Europe to go over the examination that has been already made by the gun-foundery board?

I wish to confine our investigation to what the Senator from Delaware desires and what I desire, namely, the amount of machinery necessary, the cost of that machinery, and the best place to plant it for the manufacture of guns from the raw material, which we shall purchase either in this country or in some other country from the manufacturers of steel.

Mr. McPHERSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Delaware why it is that instead of offering such an amendment to the appropriation bill he does not introduce a joint resolution continuing the old board both of Army and Navy officers jointly? Both branches of the service are interested. The Ordnance Department of the Government has received more attention from the War Department than from the Navy Department. It is of more importance to the War Department. Why take from the commission which has been appointed and which has reported certain facts to Congress the responsibility and power and confer it entirely upon the naval branch of the service?

Mr. BAYARD. Simply because it seemed to me more convenient to use this bill for the purpose of a mere inquiry, not detracting in the slightest from its effect and not adding a dollar to its cost, so as to get the information that would enable us to vote money as speedily as possible for the procurement of this armament. If the Senator thinks there should be a separate board, and that we should have separate action, separate consideration, more time to think——

Mr. McPHERSON. Then I shall simply ask that the amendment be modified so as to include also the Secretary of War as well as the Secretary of the Navy. If the advisory board of the Navy is included I would also include the Ordnance Bureau of the Army, as practically the same committee of investigation will be had in this case as the one who have already made their report. I suppose there will be no objection to such a modification of the amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. It is called the foundery board.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware so modify his amendment?

Mr. BAYARD. I have no objection to the modification.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to have the amendment read as modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Delaware chooses to so modify his amendment, the Chief Clerk will report it as modified.

Mr. BAYARD. All right.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, with the assistance of the Ordnance Department and the naval advisory board appointed in conformity with the act approved August 5, 1882, to report to Congress on the first day of the next ensuing session of Congress a plan and estimate for the preparation and purchase of plant for a gun-factory to complete guns from 6-inch caliber to 16-inch caliber, including buildings and shrinking-pit, &c.

Mr. HALE. Why does not the Senator, which would be better still, provide that this shall be done by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, with the assistance of the gun-foundery board, which is hereby revived, and then let it go on? Would not that be better than to mix up the Ordnance Department and the advisory board? I suggest to the Senator from Delaware, in lieu of "the Ordnance Department and the naval advisory board" to insert "gun-foundery board, which is hereby revived."

Mr. BAYARD. I think that would be better.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified. It will be read as modified.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, with the assistance of the gun-foundery board, which is hereby revived, appointed in conformity with the act approved August 5, 1882, to report to Congress on the first day of the next ensuing session a plan and estimate for the preparation and purchase of plant for a gun-factory to complete guns from 6-inch caliber to 16-inch caliber, including buildings and shrinking-pit.

Mr. HALE. The reference to the date should be stricken out, because that refers to the act authorizing the advisory board.

Mr. McPHERSON. I submit to the Senator from Iowa that he had better let them examine into the whole matter.

Mr. ALLISON. March 3, 1883, is the date of the act providing for the gun-foundery board.

Mr. HALE. There is no necessity to put in the date.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope the Secretary will be allowed to report the entire amendment. The remainder of it is the important part, as I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand that the Senator from Delaware has accepted the amendment suggested by the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BAYARD. I accept that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] the amendment as modified will be reported.

Mr. HALE. The whole amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The whole amendment as modified.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, with the assistance of the gun-foundery board, which is hereby revived, to report to Congress on the first day of the next ensuing session a plan and estimate for the preparation and purchase of plant for a gun-factory to complete guns from 6-inch caliber to 16-inch caliber, including buildings and shrinking-pit; and to report full and detailed estimates for the cost of the work aforesaid, and whether the same can be better and more economically performed in establishments owned by the Government or by private contract, or by a combined system, whereby said work can be accomplished partly by the Government and partly by private contract, and in what annual installments the said appropriation can most economically be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as just reported.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Where does the amendment come in?

Mr. HALE. It will follow the amendment just adopted.

Mr. BAYARD. I understand that the Senator from Maine withdrew his second amendment?

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir; all those have been withdrawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment now offered by the Senator from Maine will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. After line 382, as amended, it is proposed to insert:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to report to Congress at its next regular session a plan or plans for the construction of one armored vessel for the United States Navy of not exceeding 8,500 tons displacement, the cost of the same with machinery and armament, and the time which the process of construction of such vessel would take.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I ask to have printed as part of the debate upon the amendment just adopted a letter upon armored ships from the Secretary of the Navy, and also from the head of the advisory board.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made if there be no objection.

The letters were as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, April 11, 1884.

SIR: I transmit herewith a copy of a communication, dated this day, from the president of the naval advisory board, concerning the expediency of an appropriation for the construction of an armored broadside war vessel.

Very respectfully,

WM. E. CHANDLER,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. EUGENE HALE,
Acting Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs,
United States Senate.

NAVAL ADVISORY BOARD, Washington, April 11, 1884.

SIR: Referring to the debate in the Senate on the amendments to the naval appropriation bill, objection is raised by some Senators to granting additional vessels for the Navy on the ground that the cruisers asked for are not of such fighting quality as to match armored vessels of other nations, the inference being that if a bill were presented for the construction of an armored vessel it would meet with their approval.

The first advisory board was fully sensible of the need of armored vessels for the Navy, but, in consideration of the great need of cruisers to carry the flag abroad it recommended as the first step in "rehabilitating the Navy" the construction of vessels to supply this, the most pressing want of the service. Construction of armored vessels was confidently expected to follow in due order after a sufficient number of unarmored vessels should have been built to form a cruising force. It seems apparent that the building of armored vessels and of unarmored vessels was not proposed to be carried on simultaneously from a disinclination to call for very large appropriations.

For the purpose of conforming to the implied desires of Senators for armored ships, and from the fact that there is no doubt of the need of them, I respectfully recommend that the programme laid out by the first advisory board be so far departed from as to admit of having one armored vessel under construction constantly, even while the work of providing cruisers is in progress.

The length of time required for such constructions is from three to five years; they are very costly and will involve much study and careful preparation; besides, the selection of a type will be a matter requiring much deliberation.

In relation to the last point, the selection of a type, I submit general dimensions and some particulars of two armored vessels which represent the most advanced ideas of the present day. One of these would, most probably, be the character of the vessel that would be recommended by such a body as the advisory board.

Her British Majesty's ship Imperieuse, not yet completed, was commenced in 1881. She is called an armored cruiser, and is intended for service on foreign stations, where fast unarmored ships may have to be opposed, and where second-class ironclads may have to be engaged. Her dimensions are as follows: Length, 315 feet; beam, 61 feet; draught, 25 feet; displacement, 7,400 tons; indicated horse-power, 8,000; speed, 16 knots.

The battery will consist of four 9.2-inch guns, each mounted in an armored barbette, and six 6-inch guns in broadside. The barbettes are arranged one forward, one aft, and the others abreast of each other at the sides amidships; the heavy guns are thus situated at twice the height from the water that they would be in a turreted ship, and can be fired, three together, in any direction. The speed and armament here described does not greatly exceed that of the Chicago, but the difference in displacement of 2,900 tons admits of the following armor:

Throughout the length occupied by the machinery and boilers (139 feet) the sides are protected by 10 inches of compound armor for a depth of 8 feet, the deck over this is 1½ inch thick, bulkheads of plating 8 inches thick run athwartships at the forward and after extremities of the side armor, thus forming a citadel inclosing the machinery and boilers. Forward and abaft the citadel, at the level of its lower edge, extends a protective deck 3 inches thick sloping downward to the sides, as in the Boston and Atlanta. The barbettes are 17 feet in diameter, and are armored with 8 inches of steel, which protects the machinery for turning, elevating, and loading the gun, and an armored chute leading to below the armor-deck makes the passage of ammunition safe and rapid. The pilot tower is protected by 10 inches of armor.

Contrasting the protection afforded by the armor above stated with the vulnerability of the Chicago, the advantage of the increased displacement of the Imperieuse becomes apparent.

Another type of vessel that would come up for consideration is the turreted ship Riachuelo, just completed for the Brazilian Government by an English firm on the Thames. Her dimensions are as follows: Length, 305 feet; beam, 52 feet; draught, 20 feet; displacement, 5,700 tons; indicated horse-power, 6,000; speed, 16 knots.

The armament consists of four 9-inch guns in two turrets, and six 6-inch guns on the upper deck. There is an armor-belt of eleven inches thickness, covered by a 2-inch deck, and the turrets have ten inches of armor.

The armor protection is by no means so complete as that of the Imperieuse, nor is the arrangement of the battery so effective, but on the other hand the speed is greater and the displacement is 1,700 tons less.

These instances are cited to show that a board can not, except after the most careful study and examination, decide upon even the size and general dimensions of an armored vessel best suited for our puposes. Therefore, in suggesting the form for an act of Congress which will best carry out the recommendation I make in this communication, and estimating the time required for completing the vessel as three years, I would propose that the authority should be given somewhat in the following form, namely:

"For the construction of one armored vessel of not exceeding 7,500 tons displacement, $1,000,000; such vessel to be constructed under the same conditions as prescribed for the construction of the steel cruisers, and its armor and armament procured, at a total cost not to exceed $2,500,000."

Very respectfully,

E. SIMPSON,
Rear-Admiral, United States Navy.

Hon. WM. E. CHANDLER,
Secretary of the Navy.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. Shall the question be taken upon the amendments in gross? Hearing no objection, the Chair will so put the question.

The amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. INGALLS in the chair). The report will be received, if there be no objection.

Mr. PLUMB. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments. I give notice that I shall call the bill up for action by the Senate at an early day, probably on Wednesday morning.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. PLUMB, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of the claim of A. A. Thomas be permitted to be withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1063) to amend the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 170) in relation to the claim made by Dr. John B. Read against the United States for the alleged use of projectiles claimed as the invention of said Read, and by him alleged to have been used pursuant to a contract or arrangement made between him and the War Department, and for which no compensation has been made, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 10th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 1027) for the relief of James H. Woodard; and

An act (S. 1817) to regulate appeals and writs of error in certain cases.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will lay before the Senate certain bills from the House of Representatives for reference.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 170) in relation to the claim made by Dr. John B. Read against the United States for the alleged use of projectiles claimed as the invention of said Read, and by him alleged to have been used pursuant to a contract or arrangement made between him and the War Department, and for which no compensation has been made, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. 1084) granting a pension to Dorathea Bothner;

A bill (H. R. 2017) granting a pension to Walter Dickson;

A bill (H. R. 3331) for the relief of Ann McCarney;

SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the first special order under the assignment of special orders hitherto made, being Senate bill No. 1372.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1372) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be read by sections.

Mr. ALLISON. For amendment?

Mr. HOAR. For amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be observed if there be no objection. The Chair hears none. The Secretary will proceed to read the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to understand what the Senator from Massachusetts means by reading the bill by sections. That is to say, after we pass a section we can not go back to it?

Mr. HOAR. I should like that.

Mr. ALLISON. Otherwise there is no particular advantage in reading it by sections.

Mr. HOAR. I ask that. Of course when the bill gets into the Senate we can go back to any section.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course.

Mr. HOAR. That is understood.

The Chief Clerk read the first nine sections of the bill.

Mr. COKE. I desire to reserve the right to offer at the proper time an amendment to section 9. I give notice of it now.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that there be unanimous consent that the Senator from Texas may return to section 9 hereafter at any time when his amendment is prepared.

Mr. PLUMB. Why would it not be wise to have unanimous consent to return to any section?

Mr. HOAR. We can do that in the Senate.

Mr. PLUMB. Why not do it as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to know whether it is necessary to offer an amendment to a particular section at the first reading of the bill as we go along?

Mr. HOAR. As I understand it, the bill is now being read through by sections as in Committee of the Whole, and you can not go back to any section to offer an amendment as in Committee of the Whole unless the consent be reserved at the time; but it will be open to any Senator to offer an amendment in the Senate after the bill is reported to the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. When the bill has been read through and all the committee amendments have been acted upon the whole bill will be before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator was not present when the unanimous consent was given?

Mr. HARRIS. No, I was not.

Mr. HOAR. There are no committee amendments. Instead of reporting one hundred or two hundred amendments to be acted upon, the committee reported an original bill containing all their amendments. That is the bill before the Senate. Before the reading of the bill was begun I asked unanimous consent that the bill be read by sections for amendment, and that there should be no going back, and that was the consent given; but the statement was made that any Senator who desired to offer an amendment could offer it in the Senate notwithstanding this agreement, if it was not ready at the time the particular section was read. I understand that the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] desires to offer an amendment which is not yet prepared, and the suggestion is that he reserve the right to go back to it, to which I suppose there will be no objection.

Mr. COKE. I desire to offer an amendment to section 9, just read, whenever it shall be in order and proper to do so. I simply wish to give notice now of my intention to offer an amendment to section 9 at the proper time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Texas has the right now to propose his amendment.

Mr. COKE. Then I will propose it. In the first line of section 9, after the word "that" where it first occurs, I move to strike out the words "the court of bankruptcy may direct that," and to strike out all of the section after the word "State," in line 3; so as to make the section read:

That any debt, demand, or property claimed by the trustee shall be sued for in the appropriate court in the State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, I wish to state simply the object of the amendment. The section as it now stands, if unamended, will grant to the district and circuit courts of the United States jurisdiction over every debt and demand that may exist in favor of the estate of a bankrupt. People living fifty, one hundred, two hundred and fifty, or, as in my State, sometimes as far as three hundred or four hundred miles from a Federal court, may be sued in the Federal court by the trustee of a bankrupt for a ten or twenty dollar debt, and the costs in the Federal courts are always two or three times as heavy as they are in the State courts. The amendment that I propose strikes out all that part of the section and leaves the jurisdiction of the State courts as that jurisdiction now stands for the collection of the assets of the bankrupt.

Mr. HOAR. I think the purpose which the Senator from Texas has in view is a meritorious and proper one. I believe I did state to the Senator in private that when I originally drew the portion of the section which I drew, it contained a provision reserving the rights of the State courts as they would exist if the suit were by or against the debtor himself; but it seems to me that his amendment goes a little too far, because it not only secures the adverse party to the controversy with the bankrupt's estate from having small suits brought in the United States court at a great cost and at a great distance in some cases from his residence (which is a proper and wise security in my judgment), but it also cuts up by the roots all the existing constitutional jurisdiction of the Federal courts so far as it is possible to do that by legislation. For instance, suppose a trustee in bankruptcy has to travel from Texas to Massachusetts to collect a claim there. This amendment would deny that trustee in bankruptcy the right to appeal to the Federal court, although if the Texas debtor, the bankrupt, without going into bankruptcy, had come to Massachusetts to enforce his claim he would have that constitutional right.

If the Senator will allow his amendment to be moved and treated as pending, I think perhaps I can with a little time suggest to him, when we come back to it before the bill is finally disposed of, something which will accomplish all he wants and which will not be liable to the objection I have stated.

Mr. COKE. I do not believe that the objection made by the Senator from Massachusetts is a good one. I think the jurisdiction of the Federal courts over the debtor as it now stands would remain notwithstanding the section were amended as I propose. Yet I am entirely willing to confer with the Senator and allow the amendment to be passed over so that we can make it satisfactory.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will allow it to be passed over I will suggest a form.

Mr. COKE. Very well.

Mr. GEORGE. I was not in when the unanimous agreement was made about amendments. I do not know that I understand the extent to which the agreement was made. I desire to know now whether amendments must be offered as the bill is read by sections, or whether the mere notice of an amendment, the reservation of the right to offer an amendment, will be sufficient. I understood that that is all which will be required, but I want to have it definitely stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that under the agreement, if a section is passed over as in Committee of the Whole without amendment, it will not be open to amendment until the bill is reported to the Senate, at which time an amendment can be offered to any section of the bill.

Mr. GEORGE. Then a mere notice that an amendment would be offered will not do?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That could only be binding by further consent. The Senator could ask permission to offer an amendment at a subsequent time, and the agreement being made the section could be returned to subsequently.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask unanimous consent, then, that the agreement be extended so as to include mere notice of an amendment. I have several amendments which I have marked, but I have not prepared them. I wish to vote for the bill, but I can not vote for it as it now stands.

Mr. FRYE. What is the reason why the Senator can not offer his amendments to the bill after it is reported to the Senate? Every section of the bill will be open to amendment the moment it is reported to the Senate.

Mr. GEORGE. There seems to be some advantage, however, in passing over a section as in Committee of the Whole without amendment.

Mr. FRYE. I do not know of any.

Mr. GEORGE. And it will take no more time to act upon such amendments in Committee of the Whole than after the bill is reported to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks there is no parliamentary advantage in the matter. It is simply a question of convenience and economy of time. The right to amend is reserved absolutely.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If the Senator from Mississippi will ask unanimous consent that section 9 may be returned to for the purpose of offering any amendment that he chooses at a subsequent time to offer to it, I have no doubt that such consent will be at once given.

Mr. HOAR. So of any other section.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Or any other section.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well.

Mr. FRYE. But the Senator has not asked that there shall be unanimous consent given to return to the section.

Mr. GEORGE. I now ask unanimous consent to offer amendments, as in Committee of the Whole, after the sections have been passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To what sections?

Mr. GEORGE. There are several; I can not indicate them all now; at least half a dozen, or a dozen.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that he be permitted to offer amendments to a dozen sections of the bill after the bill has been read as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest that the simpler way would be to reconsider the consent given by the Senate when the bill was first laid before the Senate, so that the liberty which the Senator from Mississippi asks for himself may extend to us all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent to reconsider the agreement previously made in regard to the reading of the bill by sections as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOAR. I shall object to that.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Massachusetts was not attending. The Senator from Mississippi asked leave for himself to offer a number of amendments to different sections of the bill after they have been passed over in the reading as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The sections not being specified.

Mr. GEORGE. Not specified.

Mr. HARRISON. The sections not being specified. If that liberty is to be conceded it had better be uniform throughout the Chamber. Therefore I suggest we can get along better in that way.

Mr. GEORGE. To relieve Senators from all difficulty upon the subject, as I shall have the same right to offer amendments after the bill is reported to the Senate, I withdraw my request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] to section 9 is pending and undetermined, the Chair understands, the agreement being that it is to be returned to for action hereafter. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The Chief Clerk read section 10 to the end of line 13, as follows:

SEC. 10. That appeals may be taken from the district to the circuit courts in all cases in equity, and writs of error may be allowed from the circuit to the district courts in cases at law such as are mentioned in the last section, when the amount in dispute exceeds $500; but no such appeal or writ of error shall be taken or allowed unless it is claimed, and notice thereof given to the clerk of the district court, to be entered with the record of proceedings, and also to the adverse party, within twenty days after the entry of the decree or judgment sought to be reversed, nor unless the appellant or plaintiff in error shall give bond and comply with the other provisions of law relating to appeals and writs of error, respectively.

Mr. MCMILLAN. That section, I suppose, will have to be passed over pending the question as to section 9. In this section you will observe it is provided:

That appeals may be taken from the district to the circuit courts in all cases in equity, and writs of error may be allowed from the circuit to the district courts in cases at law such as are mentioned in the last section.

If that section is to be amended in accordance with the motion of the Senator from Texas, it will modify the character of that section perhaps, and there will be no subject for this reference to act upon. The sections seem to be dependent upon each other.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota ask that the section be passed over without action?

Mr. MCMILLAN. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that that would be necessary.

Mr. HOAR. I have no objection.

Mr. GEORGE. I move to amend section 10, in line 4, by striking out "such as are mentioned in the last section."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. FRYE. That should not be done unless section 9 is amended.

Mr. GEORGE. No; I want that to stand over.

Mr. HOAR. I have no doubt that I can suggest an amendment to section 9 which will accomplish entirely what the Senator from Texas wishes to accomplish, and at the same time will leave the constitutional right of any party to sue unaffected by this bill, even if we could affect it by legislation, as we can not; and if that is done, the amendment which the Senator from Mississippi suggests will not be necessary, because there will be certain cases where the jurisdiction of the United States court will still exist. It seems to me that the true arrangement would be to have a provision that the trustee shall resort to the same court as the bankrupt whose successor he is would have been compelled to resort to. That would prevent the summoning of the debtors of the bankrupt by his trustee or assignee into the Federal court for a small claim from a great distance, and in addition to that would give the court the power, where the debtor had a choice between the State or the national tribunal, to order the assignee to go into the State tribunal also. If that is done it will leave section 10 operative. I therefore suggest to the Senator from Mississippi not to move his amendment now, but to wait and see what the Senate does with section 9 when we go back to it after the amendment is drawn. If they amend section 9 in that way, which makes his amendment proper, it will be open to him in the Senate, and of course if you succeed and amend section 9 in committee the Senate will amend section 10 in the Senate if it requires amendment, as a matter of course.

Mr. GEORGE. My amendment was offered simply to leave it open for the consideration of the Senate in case the amendment of the Senator from Texas was adopted, and I have no objection to its lying over to be acted on after the Senate takes action upon the amendment of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. FRYE. There would also, if section 9 was amended, be required an amendment to section 11, and I believe those are the only two sections. Therefore I move that sections 9, 10, and 11 be passed over without prejudice. I ask unanimous consent that those three sections may be passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the sections are passed over. Shall they be read?

Mr. FRYE. There is no use in reading them now. Go on to section 12.

The Chief Clerk read section 12.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to amend in line 10 by striking out the word "one-half" and inserting "two-thirds." I do not make that motion as expressing exactly what I think on the general proposition. I have in my mind localities in which the number of commissioners here provided for will be absolutely inadequate. As the Senator from Texas said a few moments ago, there are portions of Texas three or four hundred miles remote from any Federal court, and that is just as true of the State of Kansas, and will be even under this amendment. That is to say, the people will be just as remote from the situs of these commissioners as they are now from the location of the Federal courts, because in that State, two hundred miles one way by four hundred the other, there can be only three commissioners appointed even under my amendment. It will be impossible to so locate them as that a large number of people will not be obliged, on account of the business they will have to attend to before the commissioners, to go one, two, or perhaps five hundred miles to attend before them as witnesses or as otherwise interested in the business of bankruptcy.

It ought to be the purpose of this bill to bring the convenience of the administration of the estates of bankrupts as near to the people interested as possible, and I think, therefore, that there should not be the particular limitation which has been provided for, and I am not certain that there ought to be any except such as is contained in lines 2, 3, and 4, leaving to the circuit court the question of determining absolutely the number of commissioners which may be necessary for the transaction of this business in the respective circuits. There will be no danger, I think, that this power will be abused, and if a limit is placed it ought to be placed in such a way that at least the number will be sufficient to render some accommodation to the mass of the people.

Take the State of Rhode Island, which has, I believe, three Representatives in Congress——

Mr. HOAR. Two.

Mr. PLUMB. It would be entitled to two commissioners. It is about the size of a man's hand as compared with the State of Kansas, which would be entitled to only three. While I am not contentious about any particular form of words to express the idea, I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that the bill should be amended in such a way as to accomplish the purpose I have named.

My amendment is to strike out "one-half" and insert "two-thirds," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That in States entitled to not more than six members of Congress the number of commissioners shall not exceed three, and in any State entitled to more than six members of Congress the number of commissioners shall not exceed two-thirds the number of members of Congress to which said State is entitled.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. HOAR. This, of course, renders it possible to create a larger number of officers than the bill provides for.

Mr. PLUMB. Not necessarily.

Mr. HOAR. If the court so hold. The committee were of opinion that commissioners not exceeding one-half the number of members of Congress in States where there were more than six would be able to do the business everywhere. The commissioner is to go to the neighborhood. I do not mean that he will travel to every man's house or every man's neighborhood, but he will go about to different places in the district, so that in the case of the sparsely settled territory where two Congressional districts taken together would occupy a large space of territory, it seems to me it would be better to leave the one commissioner to go to such convenient places within his jurisdiction as may be found necessary than to have another salaried officer, because persons engaged in agriculture, planting, and that class of pursuits are exempted from the involuntary operation of this bill, and the bankruptcy business in that class of communities will be very small indeed.

It seemed to the committee that it was very clear that one-half the number of the members of Congress, that is, one commissioner for every two Congressional districts, would be all that were necessary. Now, take the case of the State of Rhode Island, that is a great commercial and manufacturing community, the most thickly settled territory in the United States, crowded with manufacturers and merchants and traders who will be the subjects of this bill. I believe it is said that 95 per cent. of all persons engaged in trade in this country fail some time in their lives; it used to be said some years ago at any rate. The bill does not require two commissioners for a State like Rhode Island. It only permits it. I think that the bill goes as far as is necessary or as will be found desirable for any community in the United States.

Mr. PLUMB. There is one thing the Senator from Massachusetts should not overlook, and that is that this bill is going to occasion failures. The passage of this bill is going to double the number of failures in this country at least. I venture to say that I shall have occasion to recall that prophecy before my term expires, and to show by the records that it is proved to be true. So then it will not do to take the limited number of failures occurring now as an evidence of the business that is going into these courts. This privilege of getting rid of one's debts which is valued so highly is going to be made large use of; but it remains to be said that the number of commissioners ought to bear some relation to the territory over which they are to operate.

While it is true that now the State of Rhode Island is much more thickly populated than the State of Kansas, and it will be true always perhaps, at the same time the disparity between them is constantly lessening, and if the Senator from Massachusetts is willing to trust to the circuit court whether two commissioners are needed in the small State of Rhode Island he should be just as willing to trust to the same authority to declare how many are needed in the State of Kansas or in the State of Texas. As the Senator from Texas has called my attention to it, at the present time the State of Texas would be entitled to only five, or if you could make a commissioner out of a fraction of a man it would be five and a half, to be accurate. Under the same rule there would be three and a half for the State of Kansas. The State of Texas is larger than any other three or four of the largest of the American States, and the ability of the commissioner to transact the business, to be familar as he ought to be to some extent with the business brought before him, to have some knowledge of the country generally, would be taxed to the utmost; and so of other States as well.

While I am on this subject I would call the attention of the Senator also to the fact that the Territory of Dakota with 500,000 people, with a territory twice as large as the State of Kansas nearly, having about 156,000 square miles, and the Territory of Montana, which I think is still larger, each has only one commissioner, and that Territory is divided by great mountain ranges, with means of communication of the most primitive character. It would amount, as I think, to an embargo upon the business of the commissioners very largely, and perhaps lead to something like an unseemly strife as to who should be the one commissioner before whom all this business should be brought, and who should be charged with all these onerous and responsible duties.

I think the suggestion I make will not mar the symmetry of the bill but will add to its efficiency; and as the Senator from Massachusetts supposes that the bill is in the right direction and is going to accomplish a great deal of good, I do not see how he can object to bringing these instrumentalities nearer to the people and removing whatever doubt may exist as to the propriety of the number of persons who are to operate its provisions.

Believing that it is not unreasonable, I hope the Senate will adopt this amendment or even make the number larger. This would only add one for all the territory of Kansas; it would only add one for the State of Texas by reason of the fact that there would be no way of making the whole number exactly equal to one-half simply of the representation from that State or from the State of Kansas as it is now and will continue to be until after the census of 1890. Instead of being that it ought to be as great as three-fourths, or perhaps it would be even better if all the limitation were stricken out, so that the number of commissioners should not exceed the number of Representatives. That would enable the courts from time to time to adjust the business to be transacted under this law to the convenience of the people, and I presume the courts could be intrusted with this power. They are not under the control of politicians. It is not expected that these appointments will be made at the behest of anybody, but with a sole view to the public good, as the commissioners of the circuit court are now appointed.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I am personally entirely willing to trust the discretion of the circuit court as a general rule, but the bill was drawn in reference to what was supposed to be the settled policy of Congress, to deposit no discretion, especially a discretion to create a salaried officer anywhere. That should be left to the legislature altogether.

While I am no prophet or son of a prophet, I do not agree with the expectation of my honorable friend from Kansas that this bill is to increase bankruptcies or failures. Failures go on in this country at the rate of about 11,000 a year. That is the average of some years past. There are added to the list of undischarged insolvent debtors more than 10,000 every year, without any national bankrupt law. When there is a bankrupt law a great many debtors will settle with their creditors, make compromises and get relief, indulgence, and extension, not being as now at the mercy of any single creditor who may expect to get a preference by holding out. If a debtor now goes to his creditors and asks for a composition, any single creditor can prevent, unless he is paid in full, a compromise between debtor and creditors, whereas if this bill passes the debtor goes to the creditors with the knowledge affecting both that if the creditor will not accept a reasonable compromise that the debtor can comply with he can go into bankruptcy and get his discharge by the law and the estate will be diminished by the amount of the expenses. So unquestionably the 100,000 old bankrupts, more or less, who now exist in the United States, will a large part of them resort to the bankrupt law, and for a year or two you will have many bankruptcies; but when the law gets permanent and its settled operation goes on, I believe there will be less bankruptcies than there would be without it—fewer stoppages to business.

I am not at all strenuous about this matter; and if gentlemen like the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Kansas representing large States prefer that the limit should be two-thirds, I have no great objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PLUMB. As this general subject has been mentioned for which perhaps I am responsible, I wish to say that I regard this bill as a great improvement over the old bankrupt law. It is in fact a very much better bill than I had believed or even hoped would be drawn. I confess that I have regarded the adoption of any bankrupt bill with a great deal of apprehension. I think the repeal of the old bankrupt law was a most essential thing to the revival of the prosperity of this country.

I know, however, that there is a very wide and persistent demand for the passage of a bankrupt law; and so far as I am concerned I do not propose to interpose to prevent the result which is likely to follow from that sentiment. I am willing that it shall be embodied substantially in the form the Senator from Massachusetts has proposed. I do not doubt that this is as good a law perhaps as could be framed; but I say to the Senator that I think while it will be much better than the old law, it is still bad in some particulars. It will encourage people to enter upon doubtful ventures; it will set up in every considerable town men who are not legitimate traders, men who do not care whether they trade or not because they know they can get settlement; they can get settlement on honestly failing that they can not get now. I have had some experience in these matters and I never knew a time when a man who had honestly failed could not get a discharge by turning over his property. If he dishonestly failed some creditor would hold out and he would not get a discharge; but all the honest men can always get it. The operation of this law will be availed of by dishonest men who will go into all the towns, put out a red rag to sell goods that they have bought from somebody more credulous than wise, and run a muck against the local traders, selling goods below cost, thus breaking down honest traders; and if they do not win at that, they will simply charge the loss on somebody else, go through bankruptcy, and come out brand new, indorsed, ready for a new enterprise of the same kind.

It is largely a blow at legitimate merchants, at men who expect to pay their debts and do by a course of honest dealing, dealing with the expectation of realizing a profit to enable them to pay their debts. That class of people do not want a bankrupt law. The only class of people in this country who do want a bankrupt law is a class of men about large cities who do not care to go to the expense of local collections. They want to have machinery by which they can turn around in their own establishments and settle the whole question right there.

However, as I said, the feeling for such a bill has become a sentiment; and while any bankrupt bill would not meet with my approval, at the same time whatever bill is passed I want to have it in such a way that it may bear with the least burden on the people. I know the expenses of administering it are not to be compared with the individual expenses which will have to be incurred by persons who seek the benefit of it, who are witnesses, &c., in the settlement of cases. Therefore I want these commissioners brought by necessity as near as possible to the people whom they are to serve or with whom they are to come in contact in the administration of their great trust.

Mr. GARLAND. One of the chief objections to the former bankrupt law, enacted in 1867, with its various amendments, was the great expense which accrued, to a considerable extent out of the numerous officers, and the efforts of the committee in this direction have been to cut down as much of the expense and burden as possible, so as not to consume the entire estate of the bankrupt in expenses and that the creditors may get something.

There is a very good restriction in this section. A circuit court of two justices is to act in this particular matter in reference to the appointment of commissioners. I think if the Senator from Kansas insists on his amendment the real gist of it will be better carried out by striking out the proviso entirely, so as to leave the circuit court, with two justices, a discretion, occupying the ground and knowing the circumstances surrounding every State and the business before them, to appoint as many commissioners as the business may justify. I for one thought the bill in its present shape was better to limit them to this particular number; but if any restriction is going to be taken off I think it had better be taken off entirely and leave the judges to decide as to the necessity of these particular appointments. While I do not support the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas, yet if he is going to insist on one of that spirit and meaning I think he had better move to strike out the proviso entirely.

Mr. PLUMB. That is my preference. I think we can easily trust all this matter to the wise discretion of the circuit judges without any limitation except as to the number of Congressional districts. I would strike out the proviso so that they should not appoint more than a number equal to the number of members of Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator modify his amendment?

Mr. PLUMB. I withdraw my previous amendment and move the one suggested by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. HOAR. I shall not resist that. I defer to the judgment of Senators who live in sparsely settled States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The part proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The SECRETARY. In section 12, after the word "entitled," in line 6, it is proposed to strike out:

Provided, That in States entitled to not more than six members of Congress the number of commissioners shall not exceed three, and in any State entitled to more than six members of Congress the number of commissioners shall not exceed one-half the number of members of Congress to which said State is entitled.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill, and read from section 13 to the close of section 17.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the word "county," in line 6 of section 17, and inquire whether it should not be "country?"

Mr. HOAR. That is a misprint. Let the Secretary make the change.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That change will be made.

The Secretary read sections 18 and 19.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts who has charge of this bill the reason for the fee in this section, as indicated in line 12, of $10 to a commissioner for each case? I would substitute "not exceeding $1,000 in any one year." It seems to me where there are a great many cases in bankruptcy the salary of this officer would be unduly augmented by a fee of $10 in each case. I should like to hear from the Senator from Massachusetts upon this subject.

Mr. HOAR. The most vigorous and earnest attack upon the scheme provided by this bill which I have heard of anywhere in the country within the last six months has grown out of a claim by very intelligent and experienced persons residing in the large cities that the allowance is not enough to secure competent legal ability and responsibility and integrity in these commissioners. They say it is an attempt to get cheap law, which is always very dear law in the end. That is the criticism that has been made on the bill.

The desire of the committee and all the promoters of this bill has been to commend it to the Senate by making as great a saving as possible both to the public Treasury and to the estates in the expenses. The rock on which the old law split was the inordinate fees. But it was supposed that in some estates there would be long complicated cases where the commissioner would have to work all the time, and where he lived in a city where the expenses of living were high it was supposed that the court might in some cases find that even $3,000 a year would not be an adequate compensation. It was thought better, therefore, not to limit it absolutely to that sum. If we do put in what the Senator suggests instead of this provision, the judges will have the power which the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Texas questioned so much in regard to the discretion of the United States judges in another bill that we had up to make allowances up to the limit the bill provides, and they might do it in all cases.

This permits only $10 to be allowed for each case, and of course would allow the judges to go above $3,000 a year in those communities where the number of cases is very large; and that would be only in the commercial and manufacturing regions of the country. It seemed to us, therefore, that a limit by the cases would on the whole be safer and cheaper, and at the same time would more secure justice to the commissioner in the extraordinary cases where he ought to have an allowance than to commute it by a sum of money. We went over that matter very carefully again and again.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator will understand and the Senate will understand that judges always make an allowance. In the bill introduced by the Senator in the last session the limit was $1,000 a year instead of $10 a case. That would make the salary $4,000.

Mr. HOAR. Three thousand dollars.

Mr. GEORGE. Do the commissioners only get $2,000?

Mr. HOAR. The commissioners got $3,000 by that bill in all cases, and had an additional allowance at the discretion of the court of a thousand dollars more. If it be true that a judge will always give the maximum allowance, as the Senator says, that would make $4,000 a year all over the country. Instead of that we put it at $2,000, and then a limit by the amount of business which would not in four-fifths of the districts of the country be got up to the additional thousand dollars, but in a few districts like New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and perhaps in New Orleans, where they have a great number of cases, it is not very likely the commissioners would ordinarily come up to one hundred cases a year, which would be a case for every three days. Take one hundred cases a year and you give him an additional thousand dollars. It may be that the first year or so after the bill goes into operation in the commercial centers, districts in which the number of cases will be large, the Senator will see that if we went back to the thousand dollar allowance in connection with the amendment adopted on the motion of the Senator from Kansas, the result would be a very large increase of the aggregate expense of the bill.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator think $10 a case would be cheaper than $1,000 a year?

Mr. HOAR. I have no doubt of it whatever.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will proceed.

Sections 20 to 27 inclusive were read.

Mr. GEORGE. I would like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether the receiver can get possession of the property before it is taken without the bond provided for in section 26. In section 26 it is provided:

That no warrant or injunction interfering with or restraining the prosecution of the ordinary business of the alleged bankrupt shall issue unless the petitioning creditor execute and file with the clerk of the court a bond to the alleged bankrupt, in the penal sum of not less than $500, with sureties to be approved by the judge, conditioned to pay all damages resulting from granting the same, in case it shall be ultimately decided that the creditor was not entitled thereto.

In section 27 the court is allowed to appoint a receiver before adjudication, before the party has been found to be guilty of any act of bankruptcy, and there seems to be no provision for a bond in a case of that sort, in case the receiver shall have been improperly appointed, the party's business improperly interfered with.

Mr. HOAR. I think the provision of line 23 and the subsequent part of section 26 runs through the whole bill, and in case there is any doubt about it I will add:

The judge may, subject to the conditions of the last section——

Mr. GEORGE. As to bond.

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir—subject to the conditions as to bond in the last section—to make it free from doubt.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "may," in line 1 of section 27, it is proposed to insert:

Subject to the provisions of the last section as to a bond.

The amendment was agreed to.

Sections 28 to 31 inclusive were read.

Mr. HOAR. I think in line 17 "where" is a misprint for "when." I ask consent that that amendment be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the correction will be made. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. GEORGE. I move to strike out in line 3 of section 31 the word "five" and insert "two;" so as to read:

That any person residing within the jurisdiction of the United States, owing debts provable under this act exceeding the amount of $200, may apply, by petition.

I believe that if the amendment which I have offered is not adopted a great many meritorious cases will not get relief under this bill. I know that there are persons, and there are many persons, in this country who, being indebted to the amount of $200, are unable to make any progress in life owing to that burden which they can not get rid of. Men who are without property sometimes get involved in small sums and they find it impossible to escape from the burden thus imposed upon them. I think that it is but just and right that the limit should be reduced from $500 to $200.

Mr. HOAR. The bill reserves, as did the statute of 1800, the first bankruptcy act in this country, the power of the States over all cases which are not embraced within its provisions.

Mr. GEORGE. How is that?

Mr. HOAR. The bill reserves now, which was not the case in the last bankrupt law, but was the case in the first bankrupt law of 1800, to the States the power to provide for the discharge or otherwise deal with the case of bankrupts not included in the provisions of this bill; so that every State will be entitled to make its own arrangements for all debtors under $500.

This bill requires the payment of $50 and of $10, making $60, and 1 per cent. of the gross assets as the charge for settling the estate. That is the whole charge in all cases. Now, do you ask a person who owes $200 first to pay $60? The supposition is that he has not got $200, and has not enough to be able to make a compromise with his creditors and have the remaining money that is necessary to get relief. It seems to me it is a pretty expensive machine in proportion to his debt if he has to pay $60 to the United States and 1 per cent of the gross assets besides to get a discharge from $200. I think that $500 is little enough, and that the States will in all cases make some provision by which little indebtednesses will be provided for. Where a man owes only $100, or two or three hundred dollars, he is not very likely to have his creditors at a distance in other States. It is not likely to be a commercial bankruptcy. I think the $500 limit small enough.

Mr. GEORGE. In answer to the suggestions made by the Senator from Massachusetts, I desire to say this: In the first place, a State under the Constitution of the United States has no right to release a party from any debt due to a citizen of another State; in the second place, as to the amount of fees, it would be, if this amendment is adopted, very proper to have a further amendment reducing the amount of the deposit for costs to be made by the person who owes less than $500. There would be no want of harmony, no incongruity in such a provision in the bill to reduce say to $10 or $15 the deposit for costs required to be made by persons who owe less than $500.

I know that the benefits of this act will not reach a very large class of persons, especially in the South, who owe these little debts and who have no means of paying them. Especially I speak now—and I hate to do that by way of discrimination—in behalf of my colored constituents, many of whom owe sums of less than $500, debts contracted in one way and another. They can never relieve themselves from that liability. I do hope that the Senate in passing a bill intended to benefit insolvents and the poor people of the country will not have it so provided that those who are really in the most need of it can get no benefit from its provisions.

Mr. HOAR. In addition to the suggestions I have made that you are using too large a cannon to fire off at a small target if you reduce this to $200, there is a provision in section 43:

And the court may allow the bankrupt a sum of money, not exceeding $500, for his support pending the proceedings, if his circumstances require it.

He shall also be allowed reasonable wages for services rendered his estate at the request of his trustee, and the usual fees for his attendance as a witness when required to attend for his own examination, or in any other matter excepting at hearings on the question of his discharge.

In other words, the expense would in nine cases out of ten of those which the Senator proposes be more than the amount from which the claimant would get discharged.

Mr. GEORGE. The allowance of the $500, as I understand, is only out of the assets of the debtor; but it does seem to me that the persons to whom I have alluded ought not to be deprived of the benefit of this act because the allowance made to them might include all they possess in the world.

Mr. HOAR. Will not the State take care of that? For instance, if there is such a condition of things as the Senator supposes among the colored people of Mississippi or any other State, or the poor white laborers in my own—if there are such cases there, will not the State provide some cheap, prompt, and expeditious arrangement, without the mechanism of a bankrupt law, by which the little indebtedness of this kind may be canceled and the debtor discharged? There would not be one in ten thousand, I presume, certainly not one in one thousand, of those persons who would be found owing debts beyond the limits of the State in which they reside.

Mr. GEORGE. Suppose that they owed money to a creditor who should assign to a person residing out of the State?

Mr. HOAR. I take it the chances of a Mississippi creditor who had a debt against a colored person, whose debts all told did not exceed $200, assigning it to a citizen of another State would be very remote.

Mr. GEORGE. It may be that the States could furnish a remedy.

Mr. HOAR. My friend will pardon me. That kind of debt is not assignable. The little poor workingman does not give a negotiable promissory note for his debt. It is a debt to his grocer or to his doctor or for some little neighborhood trade. I will not detain the Senate by debating it any longer, but it seems to me it is better to leave it to the States.

Mr. GEORGE. I am obliged to say that, notwithstanding the Senator's explanations of the terms of this bill are generally satisfactory to me, and I am very willing, as a general rule, to act upon them; yet his explanation of this part of the bill has not been satisfactory.

In the first place, a good many States have never passed any insolvent laws since imprisonment for debt has been abolished. There are many agricultural States that have never passed any law of that sort at all. I do not think there was ever any such law in force in Mississippi since the abolishment of imprisonment for debt.

But, in addition to that, when we are legislating for all the people of this country under an admitted power of Congress, is it right for us to turn over to the tender mercies, or otherwise, of the several States that portion of our people, that class who are least able to protect themselves? I take it that we ought to act for them just as we do for persons of larger means.

Mr. GARLAND. For one I would prefer that the old limitation of $300 should remain in this bill, and I am disposed after all I have heard to still think so. The matter ought to be considered; and as it is getting somewhat late, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 14, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. ALBERT R. STUART, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday's proceedings was read and approved.

MRS. MILLIE E. HAYS.

Mr. BLAND. I ask by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 1252) for the relief of Millie E. Hays, widow of John Hays, deceased.

The SPEAKER. For reference or for present consideration?

Mr. BLAND. The bill has already passed the Senate and is now upon the Speaker's table, and I ask unanimous consent to take it from the Speaker's table and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, reserving the right to object.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the proper officers of the Interior Department be, and hereby are, authorized and directed to prepare and cause to be issued and delivered to Millie E. Hays, the widow of John Hays, deceased, a bounty land-warrant for eighty acres of land, upon the surrender of bounty land-warrant numbered 26454, issued under the act of Congress of September 28, 1850, in such form that the same can be located by said Millie E. Hays, or assigned and transferred by her and located by her assignee, as other land-warrants are located upon the public lands.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to taking the bill from the Speaker's table for present consideration?

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Missouri will give the House some reason why this bill should be taken up at this time for action.

Mr. BLAND. It had a favorable report in the Senate from the Committee on Public Lands and from that report it appears that John Hays did on October 9, 1852, at the United States land office at Shawneetown, in the State of Illinois, attempt to locate bounty land-warrant No. 26454, for eighty acres of land, issued under the act of Congress of September 28, 1850, to John Sullivan, upon the south half of the northwest quarter of section numbered 2, in township numbered 8 south, and range numbered 3 east; and the said John Hays had purchased the said land-warrant in good faith, and paid the full value therefor, from Robert M. Hundley, now of the city of Marion, in Williamson County, Illinois, and procured the said Hundley to make the said location of said bounty land-warrant upon said land in the name of said John Hays; and the said Robert M. Hundley finding the entire back part of said warrant covered by the written assignment of the said John Sullivan and the requisite certificates thereto, did in good faith and honesty erase the name of the party from whom he had purchased the said warrant and to whom the said John Sullivan had so assigned the same on the back thereof, and insert the name of the said John Hays, to whom he had sold the said warrant; and Robert M. Hundley did thereupon complete the location of said warrant upon the said land in the name of the said John Hays so far as the same could be done at the said local land office and deliver the said land-warrant to the register and the receiver of the said land office, and did receive from the said local land officers a duplicate receipt of said location; and the local land officers did forward the said land-warrant with the said John Hays's name written over the said erasure in the said assignment, with one of the duplicate receipts of the said location in the name of said Hays, to the General Land Office, at Washington, D. C.; and the Commissioner of the General Land Office suspended the said location because of the said erasure in the said assignment thereof, and returned the said land-warrant to the said local land office for correction; and the said John Hays was unable to perfect the assignment as required, not being able to find the said John Sullivan or the party whose name had been erased, and in 1856 returned the said land-warrant to the General Land Office; and in 1860 the Commissioner of the General Land Office addressed a letter to said Hays advising him of said suspension; and in 1878 the duplicate receipt of the said location thereof was sent to the General Land Office, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office returned the said land-warrant, with a copy of said letter to said Hays advising him of the suspension; and the said land-warrant was again returned to the General Land Office, with the affidavits of the said Hays and the said Hundley explaining the said erasure and assignment, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office refused to issue a patent until the assignment was perfected as required, and returned the said land-warrant with the affidavits thereto attached, and advising that cash could be substituted for the warrant and a patent issue in the name of John Hays; and a cash payment for the said land was thereupon made to the General Land Office in lieu of the attempted location of said bounty land-warrant, and a patent issued to the said John Hays, and a duplicate warrant was refused to be issued without special legislation; and the said John Hays was the actual and real owner of said land-warrant, without the pretension or assertion of any claim thereto by any person whomsoever, and departed this life in the year 1879, leaving his widow, the said Millie E. Hays, entitled to said land-warrant.

There was no objection. The bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE IN MAINE.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent to submit for adoption at this time the resolution I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that the foot-and-mouth disease has been introduced into the State of Maine through the fault or oversight of the United States officials who are charged with the duty of inspecting the quarantine importations of cattle: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to make due investigation into the matter, with authority to report at any time such bill as they may deem proper, to reimburse the authorities of said State and the citizens thereof for such expenses as have been properly and judiciously incurred and may be incurred in suppressing the disease.

There was no objection, and the resolution was received and adopted.

Mr. REED moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. REED. I ask by unanimous consent that the letter of the governor of the State of Maine stating those facts be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The letter is as follows:

STATE OF MAINE, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Augusta, April 11, 1884.

DEAR SIR: I was pleased to learn that you had followed up my request made to Commissioner Loring, and that Professor Smith had been designated to report to me.

The United States is largely responsible for the introduction of this dreaded disease into our State. It has not only created great excitement and alarm among our farmers, but has occasioned considerable individual and public expense, which must be paid. Everything has been done by our authorities to keep the disease within narrow limits, and so far with good success. We desire to eradicate every vestige and germ of this disease. There are cattle in quarantine that belong to parties in other States. This disease has been introduced here by the importation of foreign cattle, and it is further alleged that great carelessness beyond the control of the State is the cause of this public calamity. In view of these facts, I would respectfully ask that the State have the advantage of such an appropriation of money from the United States as will satisfy the payment of all necessary bills occasioned by the introduction of this disease and will prevent further increase.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

FREDERICK ROBIE.

To Hon. THOMAS B. REED, M. C.

LABOR COMMITTEE—SPECIAL ORDER.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I submit for present consideration the following resolution on behalf of the Committee on Labor.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, April 19, be set apart for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Labor.

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve the right to object to the introduction and adoption of the resolution until the bills which are to be considered have been indicated.

Mr. HOPKINS. I can indicate the bills which it is the intention of the committee to report on that day.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let them be named in the resolution itself.

Mr. HOPKINS. I do not object to that.

Mr. HOLMAN. What are they?

Mr. HOPKINS. The bill to establish a department of labor statistics, the bill to prevent importation of labor under contract from abroad, and the bill to enforce the eight-hour law. Those, Mr. Speaker, are the only three bills which have been reported from the Committee on Labor which it is the intention to call up for action on Saturday next, if that day be set apart for the consideration of the business of the Committee on Labor.

Mr. McMILLIN. Does it except preceding orders?

The SPEAKER. It does not.

Mr. McMILLIN. Do you except the preceding orders, such as revenue bills, &c.?

Mr. HOLMAN. I must object, unless it also excepts the bills forfeiting land grants, reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ELLIS. I understand those bills are reported unanimously from the Committee on Labor.

Mr. HOPKINS. They are. If gentlemen insist on their objection, of course I will modify my resolution accordingly; but I think one day ought to be set apart for the consideration of business coming from the Committee on Labor, in which so many of our fellow-citizens are interested. This is not a continuing order, but is only to set apart one day for the consideration of that business.

Mr. HOLMAN. I thought it was a continuing order; and if it is only to set apart one day, I will withdraw all further objection.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. The bills which the gentleman has indicated are the bills which are to be considered on that day?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is understood, then, that it applies only to these three bills.

There was no objection, and the resolution was received and adopted.

Mr. HOPKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. LONG. Do those bills under that resolution take precedence of other special orders?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not decide that question at this time. The Chair has decided when other special orders are called up a vote must be taken on considering them.

ARCHIBALD HUNDLEY.

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 286) granting relief to Archibald Hundley for recommittal to the committee.

The SPEAKER. Has this bill been reported from the committee?

Mr. SHAW. It was reported by the committee without prejudice, the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. It is a bill which has been reported adversely and laid upon the table?

Mr. SHAW. Yes, sir. I ask that it be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the bill will be taken from the table and recommitted to the committee.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

DR. JOHN B. READ.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 170) in relation to the claim made by Dr. John B. Read against the United States for the alleged use of projectiles claimed as the invention of said Read, and by him alleged to have been used pursuant to a contract or arrangement made between him and the War Department, and for which no compensation has been made, and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read, subject to objection.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to organize a board of officers, of not less than three in number, selecting the same from the ordnance and artillery arms of the United States service, who shall examine all the facts relative to the said claim of Dr. J. B. Read, and ascertain whether the United States have made any use of any invention of the said Read in projectiles; whether the same, if so used, were used under any contract, express or implied; to what extent, if any, his invention was so used, and whether such use was valuable to the United States; and if so, what sum, if any, under the circumstances of the use, the United States ought in justice to pay for the same; and that such board do make their report thereon with all convenient speed to the Secretary of War, to be by him transmitted to Congress for its action in the premises; and that such report be accompanied by a statement of all the proofs submitted to and considered by them.

The committee recommend the following amendment:

In line 11, after the word "implied," insert the following words: "Whether he consented to the use of said projectiles by the confederate government against the United States, and whether his invention was used by the United States."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of this joint resolution, and that the same be put upon its passage?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Has this been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. ROSECRANS. It has been. It is all right.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. It has the unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment recommended by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ISSUE OF DUPLICATE CHECKS.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill (No. 1705) to provide for the issue of duplicate checks be taken from the Speaker's table and passed.

Mr. SHELLEY. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is in the nature of an objection.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I will state to the gentleman from Alabama that this provides simply for the issuance of duplicate pension checks which have been lost in transmission. There are a number of cases of that kind pending, and this is a general bill covering the whole ground. It will save the necessity for the passage of a number of special bills.

Mr. SHELLEY. I will withhold the objection for the present.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is withdrawn; the bill will be read.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Has that bill been reported by any committee of this House?

Mr. BURLEIGH. I think not. There are several special bills which have been recommended by the committees, but this is a general bill covering the whole ground of the special bills which have heretofore been considered by the committees of the House. As I have said, it will save the necessity for special legislation in a number of cases.

Mr. KASSON. It is all right, and ought to pass.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not know that I have any objection to this particular bill, but I think as a rule that all matters of legislation of this character should first have their consideration in some committee of the House.

Mr. MORRISON. I have objection.
The SPEAKER. Objection is made.
Mr. BURLEIGH. Then I ask its reference to the proper committee.
The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio object to its reference?
Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I have no objection to that.
Mr. WOLFORD. I object.

PUBLIC BUILDING, ASHEVILLE, N. C.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday last I reported a bill from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds for the erection of a public building at Asheville, N. C. It does not appear to have been inserted in the RECORD. I now ask that the proper reference of the report be made.
The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the gentleman from Tennessee had himself withdrawn the report, and it therefore was not considered as having been presented.
Mr. YOUNG. Then I now ask consent to offer it and that it be inserted in the Journal and RECORD.
There was no objection.
Mr. YOUNG, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 1125, a bill (H. R. 6543) for the erection of a public building at Asheville, N. C.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of States for the introduction and reference of bills and joint resolutions. Under this call resolutions and memorials of State and Territorial Legislatures are also in order for reference to appropriate committees, and also resolutions of inquiry addressed to heads of Departments.

RITTENHOUSE MOORE.

Mr. SHELLEY introduced a bill (H. R. 6544) for the relief of Rittenhouse Moore, of Alabama; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

CHICKASAW NATION OF INDIANS.

Mr. SHELLEY also introduced a bill (H. R. 6545) for the relief of the freedmen of the Chickasaw Nation of Indians; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REORGANIZATION OF THE SUPREME COURT.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama, introduced a bill (H. R. 6546) to reorganize the Supreme Court of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

POSTAL TELEGRAPH.

Mr. BUDD submitted a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of California indorsing and asking the passage of the postal-telegraph bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.
Mr. BUDD. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be printed in the RECORD.
Mr. COSGROVE. I object.
The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the request can not now be entertained even if objection had not been made, this being simply a call of States for the introduction and reference of bills.

VETERANS' HOME OF CALIFORNIA.

Mr. ROSECRANS introduced a bill (H. R. 6547) authorizing the issue of clothing to the inmates of the Veterans' Home of California; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIM OF FLORIDA.

Mr. DAVIDSON introduced a bill (H. R. 6548) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to settle the claim of the State of Florida on account of expenditures made in suppressing Indian hostilities; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF LOUIS GOLDSTONE.

Mr. BISBEE introduced a bill (H. R. 6549) for the relief of the heirs of Louis Goldstone; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

THOMAS FLYNN.

Mr. BUCHANAN introduced a bill (H. R. 6550) for the relief of Thomas Flynn; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. MARY S. STONE.

Mr. HAMMOND introduced a bill (H. R. 6551) for the relief of Mrs. Mary S. Stone, administratrix; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MARGARET BEYMER.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois (by Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois), introduced a bill (H. R. 6552) granting a pension to Margaret Beymer; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MARY C. REIMAN.

Mr. HITT introduced a bill (H. R. 6553) granting a pension to Mary C. Reiman; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PHILIP TRAMELL.

Mr. TOWNSHEND introduced a bill (H. R. 6554) granting a pension to Philip Tramell, late private Company I, Third Illinois Volunteers, in the Mexican war; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. MARY HAVENS.

Mr. SPRINGER introduced a bill (H. R. 6555) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary Havens and minor children; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

NAMES OF STREETS IN WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. SPRINGER also introduced a bill (prepared by Mr. Goodfellow, of the Coast Survey) (H. R. 6556) to change the names of certain streets in the city of Washington, D. C.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.
Mr. SPRINGER. I introduce this bill by request of a gentleman connected with the Geodetic Survey.

CHRISTOPHER C. CANN.

Mr. WARD introduced a bill (H. R. 6557) for the relief of Christopher C. Cann; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ELIZABETH CHAPMAN.

Mr. COBB introduced a bill (H. R. 6558) for the relief of Elizabeth Chapman; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN A. HASSELL.

Mr. HEPBURN introduced a bill (H. R. 6559) for the relief of John A. Hassell, late of Company M, Third Iowa Cavalry Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JACOB ZIKES.

Mr. FUNSTON introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 227) for the relief of Jacob Zikes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

TAXATION ON INCOMES.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky, introduced a bill (H. R. 6560) to equalize taxation and impose a tax on incomes over $5,000; which was read a first and second time.
Mr. ELLIS. I call for the reading of that bill.
The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas the bondholders and millionaires have paid no tax upon their incomes to support the Federal Government for over twenty years; and

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
In the year one thousand eight hundred and eighty-four.

Resolution relative to the revenue-marine service of the United States.

Resolved, That the Legislature of Massachusetts is fully impressed with the importance of the revenue marine and the efficient and valuable service it has rendered to the Government and to the ocean, lake, and river commerce of the country, as well as in saving the lives and property of hundreds of those engaged therein; and

Resolved, That as there is no provision of law whereby those who may become disabled by age, injuries, or other cause in said service may be retired, as is the case in the naval and military service of the Government, which in the judgment of this Legislature should be remedied: Therefore,

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Legislature of this Commonwealth that the bill (H. Joint resolution and memorial in regard to jurisdiction of United States circuit courts.

Whereas by act of Congress approved September 24, 1789, the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States in suits between citizens of different States was extended to cases in which the amount in controversy exceeded $500; and

Whereas for almost one hundred years the amount thus fixed has remained unchanged, while the commercial and material interests of the country and the business of the courts have increased many fold, and the reasons why so small an amount should determine such jurisdiction no longer exist; and

Whereas corporations organized under the laws of other States and doing business in the State of Iowa have systematically removed all cases possible to the United States courts, thus compelling the citizen of this State to pursue his remedy in the United States court, and in many cases amounting to a denial of justice and causing great inconvenience, unreasonable delay, and unnecessary expense: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress are hereby requested to use their influence to procure such a modification and change of existing law, so as to increase the amount determining the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, commensurate with the increase of commercial interests and business of the courts and the demands of the people.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be directed to forward to the President of the Senate of the United States and the Speaker of the House of Representatives a copy of the foregoing resolutions, with the request that the same be laid before each House of Congress and that a copy be sent to each Senator and member of Congress from this State.

Approved April 3, 1884.

STATE OF IOWA, OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE.

I hereby certify the foregoing to be a true copy of the original on file in this office.

[SEAL.] J. A. T. HULL, Secretary of State.
W. T. HAMMOND, Deputy.

MARY C. AXLINE.

Mr. McCOID introduced a bill (H. R. 6653) granting a pension to Mary C. Axline; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN P. STEWART.

Mr. McCOID also introduced a bill (H. R. 6654) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of John P. Stewart, late private Company D, Third Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION.

Mr. McCOID also introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 230) for the appointment of a commission of seventy-six, composed of two persons from each State in the United States, of different political parties, for the purpose of considering and proposing to the several States the propriety of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States calling a convention to meet on the 4th day of July, 1887, for the purpose of proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

HULDAH MAYO.

Mr. MILLIKEN introduced a bill (H. R. 6655) granting a pension to Huldah Mayo; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HANCOCK. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. There is no morning hour to-day. The amendment to the rules adopted by the House at its present session sets apart the second and fourth Mondays of each calendar month, immediately after the call of States, for the consideration of business reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HANCOCK. In probably a couple of hours we can dispose of the pending appropriation bill for the payment of pensions. If in order, I move to dispense with the consideration of business of the Committee on the District of Columbia for that purpose.

Mr. SHELLEY. I make the point of order that the Chair can not entertain that motion at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the resolution to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the second and fourth Mondays of each calendar month hereafter during the continuance of the Forty-eighth Congress, after the call of States and Territories for bills and joint resolutions be, and the same are hereby, set apart for the consideration of such business as may be presented by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The motion made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HANCOCK] is not in order. Under the rules of the House the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is not in order until after the morning hour. The gentleman from Texas will observe the resolution just read destroys the morning hour entirely on those Mondays and sets them apart for the consideration of bills reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BARBOUR. I call for the regular order.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I ask unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for by the gentleman from Virginia, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia. The regular order is the consideration of business reported by that committee.

Mr. FINDLAY. I desire to submit a resolution for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is the call for the regular order withdrawn?

Mr. BARBOUR. Is it in order to make a qualified withdrawal?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must withdraw the demand or insist upon it.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is insisted upon by several gentlemen.

Mr. BARBOUR. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS], a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, is authorized by the committee to call up the first bill for consideration to-day, and I yield to him for that purpose.

BENEVOLENT INSTITUTIONS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, ETC.

Mr. McCOMAS. By instructions of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I now call up for consideration from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 1063, to amend the Revised Statutes of the United States relative to the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the following sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States of America relating to the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, amended in the following manner, that is to say:

Section 545, by striking out the words "not exceeding twenty years;" so that the same shall read:

"SEC. 545. Any three or more persons of full age, citizens of the United States, a majority of whom shall be citizens of the District, who desire to associate themselves for benevolent, charitable, educational, literary, musical, scientific, religious, or missionary purposes, including societies formed for mutual improvement or for the promotion of the arts, may make, sign, and acknowledge, before any officer authorized to take acknowledgment of deeds in the District, and file in the office of the recorder of deeds, to be recorded by him, a certificate in writing in which shall be stated—

"First. The name or title by which such society shall be known in law.

"Second. The term for which it is organized.

"Third. The particular business and objects of the society.

"Fourth. The number of its trustees, directors, or managers for the first year of its existence."

Section 546, by adding at the end thereof the words "and other real and personal property, the clear annual income from which shall not exceed in value $25,000;" so that the same shall read:

"SEC. 546. Upon filing their certificate the persons who shall have signed and acknowledged the same, and their associates and successors, shall be a body politic and corporate, by the name stated in such certificate; and by that name they and their successors may have and use a common seal, and may alter and change the same at pleasure, and may make by-laws and elect officers and agents, and may take, receive, hold, and convey real and personal estate necessary for the purposes of the society, as stated in their certificate, and other real and personal property, the clear annual income from which shall not exceed in value $25,000: Pro- vided, however, That this section shall not be construed to exempt any property from taxation in addition to that now specifically exempted by law."

Section 547, by striking out the words "annually, or oftener, elect from its members," and inserting the word "elect" after the word "may," in the first line; so that the same shall read:

"SEC. 547. Such incorporated society may elect its trustees, directors, or managers at such time and place and in such manner as may be specified in its by-laws, who shall have the control and management of the affairs and funds of the society, and a majority of whom shall be a quorum for the transaction of business; and whenever any vacancy shall happen in such board of trustees, directors, or managers, the vacancy shall be filled in such manner as shall be provided by the by-laws of the society."

That section 549 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and in lieu of said section the following is enacted:

"SEC. 459. Any property of the corporation may be leased, encumbered by mortgage or deed of trust in the nature of a mortgage, or sold and conveyed absolutely, when authorized by a vote of a majority of the shares of stock of the corporation, or by a vote of a majority of the directors, managers, or trustees of the corporation, at a meeting called for the purpose, and the proceedings of which meeting shall be duly entered in the records of the corporation; and the proceeds arising therefrom shall be applied or invested for the use and benefit of such corporation."

SEC. 2. That section 551 of the Revised States relating to the District of Columbia be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 3. That any corporation heretofore formed under sections 545 to 552, inclusive, of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia, may avail itself of the provisions of this act by complying with its requirements, and those that this act is intended to amend; but the right to repeal this act, and to alter, amend, or abolish any charter of incorporation granted under it, is expressly reserved to Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I will give the gentleman an opportunity to have his amendment read.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Botanical and Agricultural Departments, as well as the Smithsonian Institute, be kept open on Sundays between the hours of 9 a. m. and 4 p. m. from the time of the passage of this act.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I do not yield to have that amendment offered; only to have it read for information. I would be glad to accommodate my friend from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD], but his proposition is in no sense germane to the bill amending the Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia with respect to the incorporation of benevolent and charitable institutions.

Mr. BELFORD. Do you not think that looking at God's flowers on Sunday is a benevolent institution?

Mr. MCCOMAS. I have, as the gentleman has, the highest admiration for flowers, beautiful flowers, but they are not relevant to the bill just read by the clerk.

Mr. BELFORD. I think such a provision as this should be adopted.

Mr. MCCOMAS. This bill is for the purpose of improving and revising the Statutes of the District of Columbia, so that a hospital or an educational, benevolent, scientific, or other similar institution organized in this district may not be restricted to a life of twenty years, because an institution with such a benevolent purpose should not be limited to an existence of only twenty years. It is also intended to strike out that provision of the Revised Statutes whereby such a benevolent society, unlike a business corporation, is in this District allowed to hold property only for the term of five years. And the institution or society is also restricted to holding only such property as is absolutely necessary to the purpose of the corporation, and can not hold any other property in aid of the benevolent purpose intended to be accomplished by the incorporation.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. That is the existing law.

Mr. MCCOMAS. That is the existing law. Under the existing law these societies are not allowed to elect as trustees and managers persons other than members of the societies; they can not now, as is often desirable, elect benevolent individuals residing elsewhere than in the District of Columbia to aid or assist in the management of the societies. Nor under existing law can these corporations mortgage or encumber any of their property, no matter how beneficial the purpose wherefor they would raise funds. Nor can they in this District sell or dispose of such property in the ordinary mode, or hold any property which is not eligible for their direct purpose. Any such society is at the mercy of any purchasers who would enforce the law against it and compel it to sell the property which it thus holds.

I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have read, a letter from Justice Miller of the Supreme Court, and one from Mr. Niles, the president of the Children's Hospital in this District.

The Clerk read as follows:

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, February 5, 1884.

DEAR SIR: As president of the Garfield Memorial Hospital, organized under the general law of the District of Columbia, my attention has been called to serious defects in that law.

These were, perhaps, of no great consequence when special charters could easily have been obtained from Congress, and when occasions for such charters were few, but with the growth of the District in wealth, in culture, and in population, much of which needs charitable and benevolent organizations, the restricted and limited character of the powers conferred by the general law need reconsideration.

A very well considered bill, introduced by yourself January 14, is before your committee, and I hope it will be pressed to a speedy passage.

No such corporation, for instance, can expect to become permanently useful whose existence is limited to twenty years.

And the limitation as to the amount of property, real or personal, to be held by such an institution is an effectual barrier to the establishment of any great hospital or library or other useful public corporation.

We have nearly completed a hospital with seven acres of ground. We have another lot in the city covered with buildings which by the present law we must sell within three years from this time, whether we get a good price or not, thus placing us at the mercy of any one desiring to purchase.

However these restrictions may have been appropriate at the time of their enactment, the times and the city of Washington have outgrown them, and I beg leave to solicit your earnest attention and that of your committee to the necessity of the amendments embodied in the bill.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

SAM. F. MILLER.

Hon. JOHN S. BARBOUR,
Chairman House Committee on District of Columbia.

CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL, Washington, January 11, 1884.

DEAR SIR: I am instructed by the board of directors of the Children's Hospital to request you to introduce the inclosed bill in the Senate.

The hospital was organized in 1870, under the act of Congress of May, 1870 (United States Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia, sections 545 to 552).

This act limits the existence of corporations created under it to twenty years; does not authorize such a corporation to mortgage any of its property, even though it be necessary for the advancement of the object for which it was organized; does not authorize it to hold real estate more than five years, except such as is in actual use of the corporation; does not authorize it to sell its real estate unless it surrenders its charter, except the lot in actual use, in which case the proceeds must be invested in the purchase of another lot to be used for the same purpose; and requires the election of trustees to be held every year, instead of in classes of one, two, and three or more years. The object of this bill is to remove these obstacles.

The Children's Hospital is particularly anxious to have the amendment passed, because several years ago Dr. J. C. Hall left it several pieces of unimproved real estate, which yield no income, but are a burden to the hospital by the annual payment of taxes.

Hoping that you will comply with the request of the directors, and will also give the matter your favorable attention when it comes before your committee (District of Columbia), and before the House, I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

SAMUEL V. NILES,

Hon. JOHN S. BARBOUR,
Chairman of Committee on District of Columbia,
House of Representatives.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I also hold in my hand, but will not trouble the House with it, another letter complaining of other grievances and showing that societies incorporated in this District for these purposes have been compelled to take much of the property intended for their purposes in the names of private persons, trustees, with power to mortgage it, in order that they might carry out the purposes of the incorporation.

The Senate bill which has been read is a substitute for a bill which was introduced into this House by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR], the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia for this House, and a bill introduced into the Senate by the honorable Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate. On the 1st of April this substitute bill passed the Senate unanimously; there was no objection whatever to it. As I have said, by an amendment to section 545 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the District of Columbia, the limit of existence for these corporations to twenty years is stricken out; and by an amendment to section 546 of the Revised Statutes for the District of Columbia these benevolent associations or corporations are empowered to hold property which may be beneficial to their purpose, and to any extent, the clear annual income of which shall not exceed $2,500. By these amendments the Garfield Hospital, the Children's Hospital, and other benevolent institutions of this District of Columbia may hold property which may be given or devised to them, all the property to be subject to taxation as is the property of other institutions and of individuals. In this District the only property which is not taxed is that of churches, schools, and cemeteries.

Section 547 as amended allows the election of trustees or managers according to the by-laws and ordinary regulations of such societies usual in all the States.

Section 549 as amended allows the mortgaging or encumbering of property by the corporation in the ordinary mode allowed in many of the States.

For the same purpose the bill strikes out section 551, whereby other property than that whereon the buildings of the society stands can be held for five years only. As Mr. Niles has stated in the letter just read from the desk, one of these benevolent institutions has received from an eminent physician of this District, Dr. Hall, a devise of land in this District, which under existing law must be disposed of to the highest bidder, because the society is required to sell it in five years. To avoid such a necessity, section 551 is stricken out.

After this explanation of the scope of the substitute bill passed by the Senate, having in view an obviously good purpose, I will reserve the remainder of my time, though I am ready to yield to any gentleman who desires to ask any question. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD].

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say in the first place that I most cheerfully support this bill. But I wish to call the attention of the House to an abuse which exists and should be cured. I have tried to cure it by the amendment I have proposed.

On two occasions I have gone to visit the Agricultural, Smithsonian, and Botanical Gardens with ladies from my State on Sunday, because I could find no other time to do so, but have found those places closed. Now, I say this thing ought to be corrected. These gardens ought to be opened every day. God made time and we made days. Now, let us have every day wherein we may inspect the beautiful flowers that God has created. That is what I insist upon; that is the object of my amendment.

But under existing rules and regulations not a member of this House can take his lady friends to the Agricultural Department or the Smithsonian Institution or the Botanical Garden on Sunday and allow them to inspect the beautiful creations of Providence.

Is Sunday any better than Saturday, or is Saturday any better than Monday? Those are questions for us to consider; and I have the courage on the floor of this House to propose them for your consideration. Therefore I have offered this amendment.

A MEMBER. You should read your Bible on Sunday.

Mr. BELFORD. Yes, sir; I read four chapters in the New Testament last night before I went to sleep.

Mr. Speaker, I recollect very well when I was a boy in the State of Pennsylvania they would not allow the street-cars to run on Sunday; and I remember hearing Mr. Porter, the great lawyer of that State, argue against the constitutionality of the law prohibiting street-cars from running on Sunday. Do not the cars now run on Sunday in this city and every other large city of this continent? After appropriating the money of this Government to keep the Agricultural Department and the Botanical Gardens going, why should we not have the privilege of requiring them to keep open on Sunday, to the end that the poor people who work all the week may enjoy the beauty of the flowers and the aromas connected with them? This is what we ought to do as sensible men.

I take advantage of this bill to offer the amendment because it is the first measure to which I have had opportunity to attach it. I say it is an abuse and an outrage to exclude from these places on Sunday the poor people who can not get there on week days. There is nothing so beautifully typical of the love of God as a blooming rose or a blushing violet or a sweet-smelling pansy. Can we not keep these places open, that we may there worship God on Sunday, not under the shadow of the altar, but in the blaze of the beauty that the Almighty has created? [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McCOMAS. I am glad that the missionary zeal of my friend from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] respecting flowers moves him to support this bill, though he advocates an amendment which is not relevant. I hope my friend from Colorado, and other gentlemen of this House, will look to these human flowers—the little ones of the Children's Hospital and the poor whom we "always have with us." To these the charitable purposes of this bill directly relate.

Mr. BELFORD. Do you not love a bouquet of flowers at the bedside of sickness?

Mr. McCOMAS. I hope the support which my friend from Colorado gives to this bill will obviate any need of further discussion. Unless some gentleman desires further explanation or debate, I will move the previous question, that the bill may be read the third time and passed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS] did not yield for the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. McCOMAS. I did not.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon ordering the previous question on the third reading of the bill.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McCOMAS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 3956) to amend section 2527 of the Revised Statutes relating to the district of Gloucester.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BARBOUR. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. VANCE in the chair.

BRIDGE OVER THE POTOMAC.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BARBOUR. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 3810) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at the Three Sisters, near Georgetown, D. C.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be constructed across the Potomac River, at the Three Sisters, above Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, a substantial iron and masonry bridge with approaches; and the sum of $220,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the construction of said bridge and approaches, the same to be maintained as a free bridge for travel: Provided, That the Secretary of War shall construct a bridge upon such plan as shall cost no more than the amount herein appropriated, and which cost shall include the construction of a substantial iron bridge over the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal and highway, and any and all approaches to the said iron bridge; and no part of this appropriation shall be paid out of the Treasury until contracts shall have been entered into with responsible parties, and with good and sufficient sureties, to be approved by the Secretary of War, for the construction and completion of said bridge, including the masonry, iron-work, and approaches, at a cost not to exceed $220,000: And provided also, That the sum which may be expended under this act shall be treated and regarded as a part of the general expenses of the District of Columbia, and the United States shall be credited with the amount which it may pay under this act for the erection of said bridge upon its 50 per cent. of the expenses of the District of Columbia, as provided in the act of June 11, 1878, entitled "An act providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia:" Provided further, That the Secretary of War shall, as soon as possible, cause a survey of the river to be made at the Three Sisters, determine the length, width, and height of said bridge, and thereupon advertise for plans and price for the construction of said bridge, such advertisement to be inserted in one or more daily newspapers published in Washington, D. C.; New York; Cleveland, Ohio; Detroit, Mich.; Philadelphia, Pa.; Chicago, Ill., and Richmond, Va., for the space of one week: And provided further, That the sum of $15,000 shall be available at once for such investigation and surveys and such contingencies as the Secretary of War shall deem necessary.

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SHELLEY] who reported the bill.

Mr. SHELLEY. I ask the Clerk to read the amendments reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 7 strike out the words "two hundred and twenty" and insert "eighty."

In line 8, after the word "dollars," insert "in addition to the sum heretofore provided in act 23d February, 1881."

Strike out all after line 16, including line 22 and a part of line 23, including the word "dollars," and insert the following: "And provided further, That no moneys appropriated by the bill should be expended until the proper authorities in the State of Virginia shall have given guarantees satisfactory to the Secretary of War to open and construct the necessary road or roads to connect the said bridge with the highways of that State, and to keep the said road or roads in good repair and open for free travel."

After the word "sum," in line 41, insert the words "not exceeding."

Mr. SHELLEY. Mr. Chairman, the act of Congress approved February 23, 1881, appropriated the sum of $140,000 for the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at or near Georgetown. It was left to the discretion of the Secretary of War, and he sought to purchase the bridge known as the Aqueduct Bridge, which is now a toll bridge; but in attempting to negotiate with the lessees of that bridge he discovered from the parties in interest it was impossible to get a good title to that property. He then directed surveys to be made to ascertain the best site upon which the new bridge should be located. The engineers in charge of the work selected the site known as the Three Sisters as the most favorable for the construction of the bridge on account of cheapness, convenience, &c.

Mr. BLOUNT. Where is it?

Mr. SHELLEY. About half a mile beyond the Aqueduct Bridge; not quite half a mile. It was ascertained by the engineers in charge of the work that the amount appropriated is not sufficient to construct a suitable bridge in a proper location. Propositions were invited for the construction of a bridge in the location selected, and the bids showed that the $140,000 appropriated was inadequate.

This estimate exceeds the amount appropriated by the act referred to in the sum of $80,000, making the total cost of the structure $220,000, which sum is deemed sufficient by the Engineer Department for the construction of a substantial bridge of masonry and iron of ample strength and durability to insure safety and avoid accidents.

The report of the engineers is found in Executive Document 156, first session Forty-seventh Congress. The location recommended by the department—the Three Sisters—is regarded also as the most suitable on the score of convenience and economy. The site named is above the point where it is possible to navigate the river at present with steamers or large vessels, and it will not be necessary to construct a draw in the bridge for the passage of vessels.

The necessity for a free bridge at or near Georgetown for the convenience of personal and commercial intercourse between the citizens of the District and of Alexandria and Fairfax Counties, in Virginia, is admitted by all, while the interests of the Government would be promoted by its construction.

It will require a bridge of about 1,100 feet in length to span the river at that point. At any other than the site selected, either adjacent to, above, or below the present Aqueduct Bridge, the length of bridge required would be some 1,700 feet, and therefore necessarily more expensive than at this point, known as the Three Sisters.

I think it hardly necessary to say anything to show this committee the necessity of constructing a bridge which shall be open free to traffic and travel across the Potomac at some convenient point near the city of Georgetown.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. SHELLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. This bill, I believe, provides that one half of the expenditure for the construction of this bridge shall be borne by the United States and the other half by the citizens of this District.

Mr. SHELLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now I wish to ask upon what principle does my friend think the public Treasury ought to bear that burden? This bridge is being erected for the benefit of the citizens of the District of Columbia. Why, then, should the Government of the United States pay for it?

Mr. SHELLEY. There are several very good and forcible reasons why the General Government should pay its proportion of the amount necessary to construct this bridge. Among other things I might state, in the first place, that the Government makes important and constant use of this bridge. They pay now an annual rental or tollage to the present bridge company of about $600, I think. In addition to that the law provides, and I think very equitably and properly, that the Government of the United States should pay one-half of all the expenses incurred in the District of Columbia of every kind and character. I do not see that there are any reasons why the Government should not bear its proportion of this expenditure. On the contrary, everything seems to warrant and justify it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does my friend think that the law passed a few years ago which fastened upon the public Treasury one-half of the expenses of the Government of the District of Columbia is a fair and reasonable regulation as between the Government and the people of the District?

Mr. SHELLEY. I do, undoubtedly. I think it is fair, just, equitable, and reasonable. I think it is only right that the Government, owning property as it does in this city, should bear its fair share of the expense of the government of this District.

Mr. HOLMAN. While the Government meets every conceivable expense touching its own property, as a general proposition, independent of paying 50 per cent. of the expenses of the administration of the government of the District of Columbia, does not the gentleman think that it is a little too much to ask this also? Does he not think it a little remarkable that until within a few years past—within the past ten years—it was not necessary that the Government of the United States should bear so large a proportion, or indeed any considerable proportion, of the expense of this District? Does he not know that this present regulation is of recent years? All the way back in our history——

Mr. SHELLEY. I know, Mr. Chairman, as we become more enlightened and make further advancement we will be more disposed to do justice to all people; and these improvements in the District of Columbia and these necessary works will be constructed under the laws by the General Government at less expense to the people of the District than they are now called upon to bear.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman think that the large proportion of public men from all parts of the country who have become property-owners here have any effect upon that question?

Mr. SHELLEY. I think this: that 51 or 52 per cent. of the entire property of the District of Columbia belongs to the General Government. I think that 35 or 45 per cent. of the officials of the United States are now enjoying the privileges of the District of Columbia, enjoying all the protection necessary through the police regulations and otherwise without cost except in this way—the payment by the General Government of 50 per cent. of the expenditures. I think, sir, that the time has passed when we can afford to higgle about the expense of a proper system of improvements for this city which will increase the facilities of travel to it from all the adjacent country.

Mr. BLOUNT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SHELLEY. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask him if when he says 51 per cent. of the property in this District belongs to the Government of the United States he does not put into the estimate of the property that belongs to the Government all of the streets, &c.?

Mr. SHELLEY. Reservations, &c. I will answer I do.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wanted that statement made.

Mr. SHELLEY. The streets are not included; the avenues are.

Mr. BLOUNT. They are not intended for the benefit of the people of the District, are they?

Mr. SHELLEY. Of course they enjoy them, and the Government also enjoys all of the privileges that are conferred upon any of the citizens. Besides that, the Government is using this bridge to-day, and are paying a tax every year to pass to and fro to their interests on the other side of the river.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question. He states that the Government is now using this bridge for communication between this and the other side of the river. What bridge does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. SHELLEY. The Aqueduct Bridge, located about the west end of Georgetown.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I am not very familiar with the location, and have therefore asked for information.

Mr. SHELLEY. This bridge is owned by a company and is a toll-bridge.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Would the people necessarily make use of that bridge to pass to the cemetery on the other side of the river?

Mr. SHELLEY. They would if it was a free bridge.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is it located at a convenient point for that purpose?

Mr. SHELLEY. I think so, sir; perhaps the most convenient point. The engineers have selected the site at the Three Sisters, which is not so convenient a point, but is more economical. It is no doubt true, however, that the Aqueduct Bridge would be the most convenient site.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It seems to me it is rather far up to be convenient. But there may be questions of engineering and of construction that should influence that matter.

Mr. SHELLEY. When you come a thousand feet below the Aqueduct Bridge you have to cross Analostan Island, making a very expensive structure.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not doubt another bridge is needed; but I do not quite indorse the theory of my friend from Alabama that the Government ought to pay all the taxes for all its employés and officers. I think they should pay their own share.

Mr. SHELLEY. I did not make any such statment.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I am glad that is not a correct inference from what the gentleman stated.

Mr. SHELLEY. It is not a correct inference.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question. I do not remember in the bill passed some years ago for the building of a bridge——

Mr. SHELLEY. The bill was passed February 23, 1881.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not remember whether in that bill there was provision for half the expenses to be paid by the District of Columbia.

Mr. SHELLEY. Yes, sir; it required one half to be paid by the District of Columbia and the other half by the Government.

I reserve the remainder of my time for future use.

Mr. BARBOUR. I am directed by the committee to submit some amendments to the bill which has been presented by the gentleman from Alabama, and I desire to say, sir, in that connection, and as bearing on the inquiries made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], that this is not a new proposition. There is an existing appropriation made by the Forty-sixth Congress in the act passed February 23, 1881, by which $140,000 was appropriated for the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at or near Georgetown. It was left to the discretion of the Secretary of War, on the report of the military engineer, to select the site of that bridge either at the Three Sisters, as it is called, or at the Aqueduct. When the matter came up for final disposition it was found there was a difficulty about the title to the Aqueduct site—to the piers of the Aqueduct; and the appropriation was inadequate to build the bridge at the Three Sisters. And this bill is brought before Congress now with a view to supplying the inadequacy of that original provision for the construction of a bridge at the Three Sisters.

It seemed that the trouble about the Aqueduct site, which is a more direct one and where there are already piers sufficient upon which to erect a bridge—it seemed the trouble about the title at that time could not be removed, the bill requiring the fee-simple in these piers should pass to the United States with the construction of the bridge. But recently the parties have come together, and it seems now that all the parties who could make a perfect title have agreed to make that title so that the Aqueduct site comes up in the competition now as an appropriate one for the location of the bridge.

This is not an original appropriation. The appropriation heretofore made was inadequate, falling short $80,000, which is appropriated by this bill, $40,000 of which is to be contributed by the District of Columbia and $40,000 by the Government of the United States. So after all it is only a charge of $40,000 upon the Treasury.

I will say, in reply to what has fallen from the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], that I understand it has been the practice always from the beginning of the Government that the United States Government should build the bridges over the streams surrounding Washington city. They have built the bridges over the Eastern Branch. Away back in General Jackson's time they built the Long Bridge. And I believe they built the Chain Bridge. And here is a bridge essential for the connection of the District with the country on the Virginia side of the river, and essential to enable persons to pass conveniently to Arlington Cemetery and to Fort Myer, where they have a signal station, to which it is the immediate and direct approach. These two places are only half a mile apart. One is used now as a toll-bridge, and to the great detriment, inconvenience, and cost of the country people who come here to market, and who at present are compelled to cross that toll-bridge.

Then the old Long Bridge, which for a long time supplied the wants and accommodated the people on the other side of the river, was by act of Congress given to a railroad company and is now paralleled with a railroad bridge. The railroad company is compelled to keep up the bridge for vehicles. The result is that the two lines of railroad and the way for vehicles are right close together, and to pass that bridge with vehicles is a matter of extreme difficulty and danger. Of course there are teams that can pass it, but as a general thing there is a risk of life and property in crossing where so many railroad trains are continually in transit.

Under the circumstances I do not think the committee ought to hesitate to make this small additional appropriation for an object which is so much wanted, which will accommodate the markets of Washington, which will accommodate the purposes of the Government in connection with Arlington, and will accommodate the numerous visitors from all parts of the country who want to go to Arlington to see the national cemetery and to Fort Myer signal station. All these things are to be taken into account as a part of the accommodation.

Mr. BLOUNT. I should like to ask the gentleman from Virginia——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. I should in the first place prefer to have read the amendment I have indicated. I move, as an additional section to the bill which has been reported by the gentleman from Alabama, what I send to the desk.

Mr. SHELLEY. Is there an amendment pending now?

The CHAIRMAN. There are amendments submitted by the committee which are now pending.

Mr. SHELLEY. No others?

The CHAIRMAN. No others. The amendment sent up by the gentleman from Virginia will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of establishing a free bridge and in lieu of erecting the bridge provided for in the preceding section, the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, purchase the Aqueduct Bridge now crossing the Potomac River, at Georgetown: Provided, Said bridge, with all the appurtenances, rights, and franchises connected therewith, including piers and real estate for abutments and approaches, can be purchased for a sum not exceeding $85,000, to be paid to the lessees of the Alexandria Canal, and $15,000 to the Alexandria Canal Company; the said $15,000 to be applied to the discharge and satisfaction of certain judgments against said canal company which are liens against its property; which sums, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be paid out of the money appropriated by this act: Provided further, That a good and sufficient title thereto can be secured to the United States, to be approved by the Attorney-General of the United States, within sixty days after this bill shall become a law. It is further provided that the Alexandria Canal Company, or its present lessees, shall have the right to maintain at their own cost and expense a canal aqueduct of the same width and depth as the one now in use, and to attach it to or suspend it from said bridge; and whenever a permanent bridge shall be erected upon said site the same shall be of sufficient strength to sustain a canal trunk or aqueduct; but the construction, attachment, and maintenance of such trunk or aqueduct shall be such as the Secretary of War may determine, and shall be without cost or liability to the United States or the District of Columbia.

Mr. SHELLEY. With reference to the amendment just read, I desire to say that the same or similar provisions are in the law as it now exists, the law which appropriated $140,000 for the construction of a free bridge at or near Georgetown. The objection to giving this discretionary power to the Secretary of War is that the Government does not get anything but a right of way over the piers of this aqueduct bridge. The sum of $85,000 here proposed to be appropriated is merely for the purpose of obtaining the right of way, the right to build a bridge over the aqueduct piers, leaving the title to the piers and to the aqueduct in the canal company.

The Government of the United States originally paid $300,000 toward the construction of that bridge and of the canal from Georgetown to Alexandria; they loaned the company that much money for that purpose. In addition to that they donated $100,000 for the same purpose. Now, by paying the $85,000 here proposed the Government will only get the right of way over the piers of this aqueduct, the title to the piers and to the aqueduct remaining in the company.

In 1866 the present proprietors of that bridge leased it from the Alexandria Canal Company for the term of ninety-nine years, and agreed to pay the nominal sum of $1,000 a year for the canal and bridge from the north side of the Potomac to the city of Alexandria. They claim that they have expended a large amount of money in restoring the canal and building a bridge over the aqueduct in order to accommodate the public. The estimate of the cost of the bridge is $25,000—the cost of putting the bridge there which spans the Potomac. Of course the aqueduct and the piers were previously constructed. Congress granted to these lessees the right to construct a foot and wagon way over the aqueduct.

The Government is now asked to pay $85,000 to purchase back that privilege. The only investment which the lessees have made in that bridge is the sum of $25,000. The other money which they have expended can not be properly charged to the bridge, for they had to keep up the aqueduct anyhow and to keep up the canal. The Government has no use for either. The mere right of way is not worth the sum of $85,000 to the Government or to the District of Columbia. I therefore move to amend the amendment by making the amount $50,000 to be paid to the lessees for this right of way.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHELLEY. Certainly.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is this $85,000 for the purchase of the right of way over the Aqueduct Bridge to be in addition to the amount to be expended upon a new bridge?

Mr. SHELLEY. No; it is to be in lieu of it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. In lieu of the new bridge?

Mr. SHELLEY. Yes; the Government is to pay $85,000 to the lessees for this right of way.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. In which case there will be no new bridge.

Mr. SHELLEY. In that case we will not build the new bridge. The amendment also proposes to give $15,000 to the lessors of the canal company for the purpose of discharging some liabilities that rest upon this property. Then the balance of the appropriation is to be used for the construction of the superstructure over the aqueduct piers. The present wagon-way there is very frail, not sufficient for the purpose. This bill contemplates the construction of an iron bridge across these piers, above the aqueduct, of sufficient strength to sustain and support the aqueduct canal.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. There is to be a new superstructure on the piers after the purchase of the wagon-way?

Mr. SHELLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And altogether the cost would be as much as for a new bridge?

Mr. SHELLEY. Not so much.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Nearly as much.

Mr. SHELLEY. The total cost would be $200,000; $85,000 to the lessees, $15,000 to the lessors, and $100,000 for the superstructure.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Resulting in a saving of how much over a new bridge?

Mr. SHELLEY. Just $20,000.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. While I am on the floor I would like to ask another question, of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR]. That gentleman stated, I believe, that the Government has constructed the Long Bridge, the Chain Bridge, and perhaps one or two other bridges entirely. I would ask the gentleman if the State of Virginia did not join in the construction of one of these bridges?

Mr. BARBOUR. Never.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. They were constructed entirely by the Government?

Mr. BARBOUR. Entirely. I will reserve the remainder of my time, after yielding to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] for five minutes.

Mr. BELFORD. One of the most interesting epochs in our national history can be found in the first volume of Benton's abridgment of the debates of Congress, which I would like to commend to the attention of my lovable friends on the other side. It pertains to the location of this Capitol. [Going down the aisle toward the Democratic side.] They had many a serious debate in the first Congress with reference to the location of the national capital.

A MEMBER. Why do you always go over there when you speak?

Mr. BELFORD. I have to come over here to impress my views upon them.

This, gentlemen, is the capital of our nation, a nation of 50,000,000 of people, and within the next twenty years we should make it a city grander than Paris.

But we can only make it so by encircling the brows of our "Three Sisters" with the garland of flowers that I intend to have open on Sunday in the Agricultural Department. Think of one sister garlanded and belted with the most beautiful posies; and then think of three of them, and my lovable friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], with his bosom heaving and shaking and swelling in the contemplation of a spirit of grand generosity, will never declare that he objects to that belt of flowers. [Laughter.]

What objection can there possibly be to opening these agricultural grounds on Sunday? Why should any gentleman on this floor raise a point of order on such an amendment? It does not involve the expenditure of one dollar additional. You already have your employés there; and by adopting such a proposition as I offer, you open that institution for—what purpose? For the benefit of the poor people of this country.

The Democratic party has control of this House. It has control of your committees. Why do not these committees direct some member to accept an amendment so wholesome, so God-some, so beneficent as this.

I am ready to vote for this bill, and will do so cheerfully. But let us garland and garnish, let us adorn and beautify this bridge, even if it be on Sunday when the great mass of the people will cross it, with these beautiful and magnificent flowers. I appeal to you gentlemen to aid me in accomplishing this result.

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR].

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment which provides for purchasing from the Alexandria Canal Company and their lessees the entire title to the Aqueduct Bridge. One gentleman on the other side has said that the amendment proposed only the purchase of the right of way. As I understand the proposition, and if I am mistaken I hope the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia will correct me, it is to purchase for the sum of $85,000 to be paid to the lessees of the canal company and $15,000 to be paid to the lessor, the Alexandria Canal Company, the fee, the real estate, everything on both sides of the Potomac River belonging to the company, save and except the right on the part of the canal company to continue the aqueduct across the river as it is now. As I understand the matter, this easement alone is to be retained by the Alexandria Canal Company; nothing more.

As has been stated, the Aqueduct Bridge is half a mile or more east of the Three Sisters, and as a location for a bridge is much more eligible. As I understand, no sufficient calculation has yet been made to ascertain accurately the cost of constructing the bridge at the Three Sisters; but from the best information I have been able to obtain the cost will be more than $300,000. I think any gentleman having any knowledge on this subject who will examine that location will come to this conclusion. At the Three Sisters, you have on this side of the river an approach for the bridge which does not present very much difficulty, and yet it will be expensive because of its height, the ground for the approach being much more unfavorable than the ground at this end of the Aqueduct Bridge.

On the other side, the Virginia side, there is no approach at all—no way to get back from the river. On that side there is an immense gorge leading back in a northwesterly direction, very deep and very narrow. On either side of this gorge and all along the south side of the Potomac there are high hills, extending a considerable distance up and down the river and coming to the water's edge. If the bridge is built at the Three Sisters, I do not see how a road can be built from the south end of it unless at an enormous cost. The steep hills come so close to the river that a road can not be made either up or down the river to any advantage, and the chasm is so narrow and rises so rapidly as to make the construction of a road up it almost impossible.

I am unable to determine how much would be the cost of a bridge constructed at that point, or in what way the bridge would be of any very great advantage to the Government. The Aqueduct Bridge is too far to the west for the convenience of the people in Washington, and the Three Sisters is still farther west and more out of the way. The Aqueduct Bridge is at the west end of Georgetown, and the Three Sisters is half or three-quarters of a mile beyond Georgetown. But the distance from the south side of the bridge, if it is built at the Three Sisters, to Arlington and to the Government buildings on that side of the river will be increased much more than on this side on account of the circuitous route which the hills would make absolutely necessary.

But if the Aqueduct Bridge is purchased, we have a good location, and we can have a good bridge at a great deal less expense. The approaches to the Aqueduct Bridge are already built and the charter of the ground on both sides of the river at this place is admirably adapted to an improvement of this kind. The best grades that can be attained anywhere along the Potomac can be found at both ends of the Aqueduct Bridge, and as this bridge has been built for a long time the roads on the south side as well as on the north side have been located with reference to it. There is probably no better grade from any point on the river to Arlington Heights than the one from the south end of the Aqueduct Bridge. This can be learned by any gentleman who will take the trouble to make the necessary examination.

If a bridge is to be built for the benefit of the Government I think it very important that this location should be adopted rather than erect a bridge at the Three Sisters. I am not discussing the necessity of building a bridge, nor the propriety of building one. I do not propose to discuss this feature. The only point I desire to make is that if a free bridge is to be constructed across the Potomac River at either of the two places named it should be located where the Aqueduct Bridge is, and not at the point called the Three Sisters, for the reasons I have given; because it will accommodate the Government and the people of the District better, make an easier road, and will cost a great deal less money, both to the Government and the District of Columbia.

As I understand, there is no trouble in regard to this question of title. The United States Government, I believe, already owns more than one-half of the stock of the Alexandria Canal Company, which owns the fee of the land and the Aqueduct Bridge. The United States, as I understand it, owns 3,500 shares out of 6,800. I am aware that the Government has not all these shares in possession; but it has 2,280 in possession, and there has been a decree of the United States circuit court ordering the surrender of the residue. Therefore, we should not forget that this property already belongs largely to the United States. There can be no question about title, as the owners of 1,100 shares have already consented and entered into a written contract to join with the Government at the next regular meeting of the Alexandria Canal Company stockholders in the acceptance of this proposition. This 1,100 shares and the 2,280 shares which the Government now has in possession is a majority of all the stock capable of being voted, and will no doubt control the action of the company and bind all the stockholders.

No one need fear litigation, as there is but one question in the courts, and there has been but one, and this is as to the ownership of the 1,220 shares which belong to the United States and are now held by Virginia, and which she refuses for some reason to give up. The court decided against her, and she has appealed to the Supreme Court.

The piers which it is proposed to use are very large, and are said to be very good. There are perhaps no such piers anywhere else in this country. They cost more than half a million dollars, and time and use have shown them to be perfect in their structure and durability. When these piers were built it was found necessary to expend twice or thrice as much money as was expected in order to make the work durable, and I have no doubt that this indicates the additional expense which would have to be incurred in the erection of a bridge at the Three Sisters, especially in the deep and wide channel south of the rocks called Three Sisters.

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield the gentleman from Ohio five minutes more, if he so desires.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Not only is the aqueduct the best location for this new bridge; but in my judgment the erection of the bridge at that point will be a very large saving to the General Government as well as to the District of Columbia. It is true that the $85,000 to be paid to the lessees of the canal company seems to me a large sum; and I do not like the manner in which the money is to be divided as between the lessors and the lessees; but it is the way the parties themselves propose to divide it. The lessees, as I understand it, insist on having $85,000; and the lessors ask only $15,000, which I understand is to be used in removing certain liens or incumbrances now upon the property. When this sum is paid we shall have, as I understand it, an absolute title, except that the canal company is to have the right to continue the aqueduct where it is now at their own expense. The piers are large enough and strong enough so support the bridge and aqueduct both. They were so built.

I imagine that the question of title will not in the future present any difficulty. I think the time will come, and that the time is not far distant, when this privilege which the canal company proposes to reserve will be valueless to them, will be abandoned, and will cease to be any impediment to the exercise of full title on the part of the Government or the District of Columbia.

It has been stated in this debate, and, as I understand, correctly, that this lease is made for ninety-nine years at only $1,000 a year. Now, I can not imagine that the interest of the canal company in this aqueduct can be now or hereafter of any great value when the price set upon it is only $1,000 a year.

I think the time will come when these piers will be no longer used for the acqueduct, when the canal will be abandoned, and when the title of the Government will be as complete as if the purchase were now made without any reservation at all. So we are not only saving $20,000 upon the present outlay, but we will save $100,000 in addition. I do not know that this $100,000 that is provided for need be appropriated at all. It was said that it would take $100,000 to build a superstructure, but this bridge is in reasonable repair now. The piers are good.

The superstructure, to be sure, is not the very best, but it has been good enough for many years, and it is good enough now for the ordinary travel which passes over it. So then we can get a bridge and get it at once at $100,000, which is less money than has already been appropriated for this purpose. It is a toll-bridge now and can at once be turned into a free bridge. As everything else of a public character in Washington is free, your committee and the people who live here and the people who visit here think there should be a free bridge between Washington and points south of the Potomac River.

In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, we should adopt the amendment proposed by the chairman of the committee and purchase the Aqueduct Bridge and use it for the present, and when we do build a new bridge build it on the piers now owned by the canal company, the piers of the Aqueduct Bridge. In this way we will save $120,000 until we build a new bridge, and when the new bridge is built we will, according to present estimates, save $20,000, and I think from the reports of former engineers that we will save more than $100,000 and have a better bridge in a better location. The same skillful engineering that selected this point for the Aqueduct in preference to the Three Sisters fifty years ago, when they spent a million dollars in perfecting this grand work, confirms the claim I now make that it is the best location for a bridge. More than one engineer has estimated, as the executive documents show, that a good bridge at Three Sisters will cost more than $300,000, on the supposition that the rocks called Three Sisters could be used, which I think doubtful. I would be glad to see this bill so amended that we could now only purchase the Aqueduct Bridge and make it a free bridge and use it for the time being, and I suggest this to the committee.

Mr. SHELLEY. I still believe, Mr. Chairman, we can not get as much as we ought to get for this $85,000. I do not think the amendment gives us a sufficiently clear title to the piers and to the rest of the property.

Mr. BARBOUR. The bill provides that the title shall be made satisfactory to the Attorney-General of the United States.

Mr. SHELLEY. I am informed it is impossible to get these men to take less than $85,000.

I withdraw the amendment I offered of $50,000, and at the proper time will ask the House to vote on the amendment of my colleague, the gentleman from Virginia.

I think we might save the expenditure of the cost of superstructure now by simply investing a few thousand dollars in the repair of the present structure, but it is built of wood and liable to decay, needing constant repairs. The investment of $100,000 in a structure of an iron bridge would cost nothing or comparatively nothing for repairs, and in that way would save more than the interest on the money which is invested in its construction. In my judgment, therefore, the Secretary of War should be directed to proceed at once to acquire title to the bridge and to erect a suitable iron structure.

Mr. BLOUNT. I should like to ask the gentleman a question, and that is whether more than half of this property does not already belong to the Government of the United States, and furthermore whether it is a reasonable allowance to pay them the sum which has been indicated while at the same time we allow them to keep up their canal in connection with the bridge?

Mr. SHELLEY. The Government has now the clear right to about 3,200 shares of the stock—perhaps the Government will be entitled to a larger amount.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Are not the shares of the Government a majority of the whole stock?

Mr. SHELLEY. Not at all.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Are not the shares of the Government in the stock of the Alexandria Canal Company?

Mr. SHELLEY. Certainly.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. They only receive $15,000 to go to remove mortgage liens, but the $85,000 goes not for any property in which the Government of the United States has any interest whatever, but to the lessees of this Aqueduct Bridge. Hence it is not a very liberal appropriation at the best.

Mr. SHELLEY. The $85,000 goes to buy the rights of the lessees in their lease of this property. They surrender their lease for the amount of $85,000. Fifteen thousand dollars is the amount to be paid to the owners under the bill, and the Alexandria Canal Company is to be allowed to continue their canal in connection with the bridge and at their own expense.

Mr. MULDROW. I wish to offer an amendment so as to give a proper interpretation to the language intended to be employed by the committee in the bill. In line 35, after the word "with," I move to insert the words "one-half of." The purpose of the committee was to charge one-half to the District of Columbia and one-half to the United States.

Mr. BARBOUR. I am willing to accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SHELLEY. Let the amendment reported by the committee be read for the action of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the first amendment of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "220," and in lieu thereof insert "80;" so it will read: "And the sum of $80,000, in addition to the sum heretofore provided in the act of the 23d of February, 1881, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the construction of said bridge and approaches, the same to be maintained as a free bridge for travel."

Mr. BLOUNT. I should like to ask the gentleman from Alabama another question, if he will yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. SHELLEY. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have been informed that the commissioners of the District of Columbia are opposed to the construction of this bridge, and I should like to ask the gentleman from Virginia whether that is true or not?

Mr. BARBOUR. I will say in answer to the gentleman that I have no official notice individually, nor has the committee any official notice, that the commissioners are opposed to the bill. The committee are in possession of no such information. I have heard some rumors to the effect that they did not like to let the money go; that they did not want to part with so much of the fund which might be applicable for other purposes at this time. But I supposed, of course, that that was a very natural feeling on their part, and that they would desire to hold on to all of the money they could retain to apply to the improvement of the streets and sewerage of the city. But regarding this bridge as an exceedingly important question, not only to the people of the District of Columbia and the adjoining country, but to some extent a question of national importance, because it is the only method of accommodation for those persons who are going to Arlington, Fort Myer, &c., the committee have thought it necessary and proper to recommend the passage of the bill, differing in that regard from the alleged views of the commissioners.

Mr. FOLLETT. If I may be permitted to say in response to the gentleman from Virginia, I will state that I have been advised personally by the commissioners of the District of Columbia that the funds of the District government will not now justify the building of this bridge, for the reason that it necessarily comes out of the fund for the improvement of streets and the extension of the sewerage system of the District. That is the only flexible part of the appropriation for the District of Columbia, and if the funds applicable for that purpose are diverted it will to that extent suspend the extension of the sewerage system, and the improvements of the streets as well, for the time being. Now, it is regarded as very important that these works shall be continued.

It is very desirable in many parts of the city that the sewerage system shall be extended, and for that reason the commissioners tell me that for the present at least they are opposed to entering upon the work of the construction of the bridge, and that the funds would be much more advantageously expended in the city in the extension of the sewerage and in the repairs and improvements of the streets.

Mr. SHELLEY. I will answer the gentleman from Ohio——

Mr. BARBOUR. Permit me for a moment to answer the question of the gentleman.

Mr. SHELLEY. Certainly.

Mr. BARBOUR. A satisfactory answer to the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio is that this is not an original appropriation. There is an existing law which appropriates $140,000 for the construction of this bridge. That appropriation is standing now unrepealed, ready to be utilized whenever the title to the approaches is acquired and other conditions can be made favorable to the construction of the bridge. So, practically, there is nothing new recommended by the present bill. There is no new money appropriated by it, if the amendment I proposed is incorporated into the bill, excepting the $15,000 addition, which is to clear the title. That is the only real appropriation out of which the District Commissioners would have to pony up $7,500, and that they can well afford and still continue the work of street improvements, &c.

Now an appropriation has been already made to secure the building of the bridge. This question, it should be borne in mind, has been canvassed and discussed before for many years, and it finally culminated in the act of February 23, 1881. The only thing that is required at the present time in order to secure the title and prevent further delay or defeat and discouragement of the friends of the free bridge is to adopt a provision which has been inserted that if the aqueduct proposition can not be carried out in detail, then in order to secure the construction of the bridge its location has been fixed at the Three Sisters, and that the work shall be commenced within a reasonable time, and that only a period of sixty days is asked for the purpose of determining which is to be the point. I am clear in my own mind, and the committee on an examination of the subject is clear, and I think everybody that has looked into the matter is of the same opinion, that if the amendments proposed here are adopted, and this bill passed, that the title will be made clear to the satisfaction of the Attorney-General, and that this $15,000 which is required to pay an old judgment lien which binds the Alexandria Canal Company will be all the additional fund that the District will have to provide for.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is provided you make a contract with the canal company.

Mr. BARBOUR. They have already signed the papers. All that is necessary will be to call a stockholders' meeting to carry out and ratify the agreement which has been already made and signed by the directors.

Mr. BLOUNT. This proposition then in reference to the Aqueduct Bridge is a substitute for the bill as read.

Mr. BARBOUR. It is an alternative proposition. It is simply to secure a bridge.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. The first proposition was to construct a bridge at the Three Sisters. But if the Aqueduct Bridge can be acquired within the time specified by the bill, it is believed to be a better location——

Mr. SHELLEY. In reference to the opposition of the commissioners of the District of Columbia and their objection, as alleged, to this matter, I desire to say that the president of that board made his objections known to me. His objection was as stated by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOLLETT] that it would divert too much money from the improvement of the streets and the pavements and the sewerage system of the District of Columbia. They regarded that as a more important work than the construction of the bridge. But after looking into the matter and considering all of the questions the Committee on the District of Columbia differed with the commissioners. They believe the revenues of the District are sufficient to enable the commissioners to invest the sum necessary in the construction of the bridge and to go on with the ordinary improvements of the streets at the same time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment recommended by the committee, which the Clerk will read:

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out of line 7 the words "two hundred and twenty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "eighty" so that it will read:
"And the sum of $80,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated," &c.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. A word upon that amendment. I confess that I do not understand the real effect of that amendment, and I wish to ask for information. It is proposed in the bill to appropriate $220,000, but this amendment, as I understand it, reduces it to $80,000?

Mr. SHELLEY. It just increases the amount appropriated to $220,000. There was an appropriation originally of $140,000.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. This makes it $220,000?

Mr. SHELLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not understand that sum of money is likely to be used.

Mr. SHELLEY. Not unless they go on with the construction of the bridge upon that site.

Mr. MULDROW. Not if they procure the aqueduct site.

Mr. BLOUNT. And I understand the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR] to say that is about arranged.

Mr. MULDROW. That was the impression which prevailed in the committee this morning.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It seems to me we ought to know which we are to do; whether we are to buy the piers of the Aqueduct Bridge or to build a new bridge.

Mr. SHELLEY. That is the very thing which we can not determine now. If we can get the Aqueduct Bridge we will have a better site. We authorize the Secretary of War to purchase that bridge. If he succeeds in doing so we will have a site better than the other.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It leaves a good deal of discretion with the Secretary of War.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I wish to ask the gentleman from Alabama if he does not think it would be better to extend the time during which title may be acquired?

Mr. SHELLEY. I think not. I think sixty days is ample. If it is not acquired in that time it can not be acquired at all without proceedings of condemnation.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Is it not necessary that there shall be a meeting of the stockholders of the canal company, and that the title shall be perfected by the action of that corporation? And yet you have limited the time in which that is to be done to sixty days. Would it not be better to extend it to three or four months? We all know how apt delays are to arise.

Mr. SHELLEY. That matter was considered by the committee, and we came to the conclusion after consultation with the parties in interest that it could be accomplished in sixty days.

Mr. McCOMAS. I ask the gentleman from Alabama whether or not if you lengthen the time you would not at once lose the coercive force of the alternative proposition, whereby the committee hope a free bridge may be secured in a better place for a less sum of money? Would not extending the time defeat the very purpose which is had in view by the alternative proposition? Is not that so?

Mr. SHELLEY. I think it would have that effect.

Mr. BARBOUR. The only object of allowing time is to give the stockholders of the Alexandria Canal Company an opportunity to come together. A meeting has been called, I understand, for next month.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. But suppose there should be some delay, some difficulty as to the time, does not your bill compel the authorities to proceed at once after sixty days and locate the bridge at the other point?

Mr. BARBOUR. For the reasons which have been stated, I do not see that any more time is required.

Mr. SHELLEY. The sixty days begin after the bill becomes a law; and in the mean time there will be ample time to give notices and call the meeting.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the first amendment reported by the committee, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 7 and 8, strike out "$220,000" and insert "$80,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 8, after the word "dollars," insert "in addition to the sum heretofore provided in the act of the 23d of February, 1881."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out, from line 18 to line 25, the following:

"And no part of this appropriation shall be paid out of the Treasury until contracts shall have been entered into with responsible parties, and with good and sufficient sureties, to be approved by the Secretary of War, for the construction and completion of said bridge, including the masonry, iron-work, and approaches, at a cost not to exceed $220,000."

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

"And provided further, That no moneys appropriated by this act shall be expended until the proper authorities in the State of Virginia shall have given guarantees satisfactory to the Secretary of War to open and construct the necessary road or roads to connect the said bridge with the highways of that State, and to keep the said road or roads in good repair and open for free travel: And provided also."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is next on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW], which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 35, after the word "with," insert the words "one-half of;" so that it will read:

"And the United States shall be credited with one-half of the amount which it may pay under this act for the erection of said bridge upon its 50 per cent. of the expenses of the District of Columbia."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, my object being to include Saint Louis among the places where the advertisement shall be published.

The Clerk read as follows:

After "New York," in line 47, add "Saint Louis, Mo."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBOUR. I ask that the amendment which I offered under instructions of the committee be now read.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I want to offer an additional amendment at line 47. I move to insert, after the amendment just adopted the words, "Columbus, Ohio." We have great bridge-builders there, and I wish them to have an opportunity of competing.

Mr. BARBOUR. Provision is made in the bill for publication in one city of Ohio already—Cleveland.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. That is too far off.

The CHAIRMAN. The question will first be on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR], which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add as an additional section the following:

"SEC. —. That an act entitled 'An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at or near Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes,' approved February 23, 1881, be amended as follows, to wit: By striking out from the second section of said act all of said section after the words 'District of Columbia,' in the twentieth line (as printed in the United States Statutes at Large)."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I now offer my amendment.

Mr. SHELLEY. I hope the gentleman will not offer that amendment. The people of Ohio will be sufficiently informed by the advertisements in the papers at Cleveland.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I think not. I move to amend by inserting, in the forty-seventh line, after the word "Michigan," the words "Columbus, Ohio."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR] by instructions of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add as a new section the following:

"SEC. 2. That for the purpose of establishing a free bridge, and in lieu of erecting the bridge provided for in the preceding section, the Secretary of War may in his discretion purchase the Aqueduct Bridge now crossing the Potomac River at Georgetown: Provided, That the said bridge, with all the appurtenances, rights, and franchises connected therewith, including piers and real estate for abutments and approaches, can be purchased for a sum not exceeding $85,000 to be paid to the lessees of the Alexandria Canal, and $15,000 to be paid to the Alexandria Canal Company, the said $15,000 to be applied to the discharge and satisfaction of certain judgments against said canal company, which are liens against this property, which sums or so much thereof as may be necessary may be paid out of the money appropriated by this act: Provided further, That a good and sufficient title thereto can be secured to the United States, to be approved by the Attorney-General of the United States, within sixty days after this bill shall become a law: And it is further provided, That the Alexandria Canal Company or its present lessees shall have the right to maintain at their own cost or expense a canal aqueduct of the same width and depth as the one now in use, and to attach it to or suspend it from said bridge; and whenever a permanent bridge shall be erected upon said site the same shall be of sufficient strength to sustain the canal trunk or aqueduct, but the construction, attachment, or maintenance of such trunk or aqueduct shall be such as the Secretary of War may determine, and shall be without cost or liability to the United States or the District of Columbia."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment which has been read.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. What has become of the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SHELLEY] to reduce the sum of $85,000 to $50,000?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that that amendment has been withdrawn.

Mr. SHELLEY. Ascertaining that it would be an impossibility to purchase this property for the sum of $50,000 I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. McCOMAS. Was there not an amendment to reduce the sum from $85,000 to $50,000?

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. McCOMAS. Can I now renew it?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can renew the amendment.

Mr. McCOMAS. Then I do so. I move in line 8 of the amendment to strike out "$85,000" and insert "$50,000."

Mr. SHELLEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS] desire to be heard upon his amendment?

Mr. McCOMAS. I will yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SHELLEY] for a moment, if he desires it.

Mr. SHELLEY. I was convinced of the impracticability of my amendment, and therefore I withdrew it. Before I offered it I was led to believe that the purchase of this property could be made for the sum of $50,000. I have since been convinced that that can not be done, and believing that if my amendment was made it would defeat all negotiations for the purchase of this property, rather than run that risk I am willing to leave the amount at $85,000.

Mr. McCOMAS. Because I believe, as my friend from Alabama [Mr. SHELLEY] did believe, that the sum of $50,000 will be adequate for this purpose, I renew the amendment in order to obtain the sense of the House upon it. Under all the circumstances it does seem to me that the parties in interest, rather than have the other bridge built, will accept this sum, and if they do so it does seem to me that they will be amply compensated. I shall therefore ask for a vote on my amendment, because I think it is a just and fair proposition and will not antagonize the building of a free bridge.

Mr. BARBOUR. I hope it will not be the pleasure of the committee to adopt the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS]. I think if gentlemen will examine this subject and consider the facts of the case it will be perfectly apparent to them that the Government by the payment of $85,000 to the lessees of this canal and $15,000 to the lessors will be making a most excellent bargain.

These piers are very expensive; they have been put into the river at a very great cost, and the lessees of the Alexandria Canal hold possession of them. Of course the Government ought not to take this property from them without giving them a fair price for it, as a matter of equity. The Government can not put piers for any bridge across the Potomac River at any point for less than $150,000, if it can do it for that sum.

By this arrangement with these lessees the Government will obtain a free bridge at a saving at the minimum of $50,000. As I understand it, these lessees have already expended about $200,000 on this bridge and the aqueduct together. When they come forward here and offer to give the Government the use of the piers for $85,000, and the expenditure of $15,000 to the canal company will remove the obligations which now rest upon the property and enable a clear title to be given to the Government, it seems to me that we will be making a most excellent bargain.

Mr. MULDROW. I desire to say simply this, while the proposed amendment may seem to be in the direction of economy, practically that will not be the result, and I will state the reason. This bill provides for the erection of a bridge across the Potomac at the Three Sisters at an expenditure of $220,000. If this Aqueduct property can be purchased at the price indicated in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR], that is, $85,000 to the lessees and $15,000 to the lessors, making in all $100,000; and if, as would appear by the evidence given before the committee, the superstructure on these piers can be erected for the maximum cost of $100,000, then it will be a saving to the Government of $20,000 to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia. Should the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS] be adopted, limiting the price to be paid to these lessees to $50,000, in my judgment, from the evidence submitted to the committee, the parties holding the title to the piers will not part with it for that sum. If they refuse to part with it, then under the terms of the bill you will be compelled to erect the bridge at the Three Sisters at a cost of $220,000.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. What assurance have you that the bridge can be built at the Three Sisters for $220,000?

A MEMBER. The report of the engineer.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. Mr. Chairman, this bill originated in a desire, as I understand, on the part of a large population near to this city to have means of ingress and egress with respect to Washington, and from a widespread feeling that some good bridge is necessary. As far back as 1852, and continuously since, if I understand correctly, the site at the Three Sisters was designated as the most desirable point for a bridge across the Potomac. The report of the engineer corroborates this statement. All the old Virginia roads converge at the site of the Three Sisters; and a bridge there would lead into the counties of Loudoun and Fairfax; whereas at the aqueduct it leads simply to a local cut-off population in the little county of Alexandria.

Now, I believe I am not mistaken in my statement as to the desire of the people interested, so far as I can gather it and so far as it has been expressed to me. The object of locating the bridge upon these old piers of the aqueduct is simply, in my judgment, to give an opportunity to some people to sell to the Government of the United States an old played-out, broken-down, bankrupt structure, that is not worth the money they are trying to get for it.

Mr. MULDROW. The gentleman will permit me to suggest that the piers alone upon which the aqueduct bridge has been built cost the parties who erected them $600,000.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. I understand what they cost; and it will cost the United States a great deal more than $600,000 if we enter into the arrangement proposed, because the taking of these piers is to be coupled with the responsibility of keeping up the aqueduct there, which would be a constant burden upon the Government of the United States.

Mr. BARBOUR. The bill expressly excludes that.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. Moreover, I undertake to say the title to that property is bound up in a complicated litigation in the courts of the United States. I do not believe the canal company can make a good title under any circumstances, within the time limited in the bill.

A bill has passed the Senate of the United States to give to the people a good bridge on Government ground, uncomplicated with any job, and at a fair price, and in a good location.

Mr. BARBOUR. When did the bill pass the Senate?

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. I understand the bill has passed the Senate.

Mr. BARBOUR. The gentleman is mistaken. The bill has never passed the Senate, unless it passed to-day.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. I may be mistaken. I accept the gentleman's statement. Whether I am correct on that point or not, I say that a bridge located at the present aqueduct will not meet the desires and needs of the people of Virginia, because it would only open communication with Alexandria County, which, I believe, is not more than five or six miles square altogether. A bridge located at the Three Sisters will give ingress and egress to the population of Loudoun and Fairfax Counties and the adjacent country.

I hope the House, before acting on this question, will consider these things and not trammel or handicap this bill with amendments, the result of which, in my judgment, can only be to put money into the pocket of a bankrupt concern that has possession of these old piers and wants to make a good fat thing out of the Government of the United States by selling them to it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the Committee of the Whole, in the amendment already adopted, has decided the question which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JOHN S. WISE] has been discussing. Probably he was not present when the vote was taken. As I understand, the matter before the Committee of the Whole at this time is a very simple one. The question is whether the Secretary of War shall have the privilege of paying $50,000 or $85,000 for these piers. The amount originally proposed was $85,000. An amendment was made, as I understand, reducing the sum to $50,000 and that amendment was rejected. But the gentleman from Maryland has renewed the amendment, and the question is now simply, as I understand, whether the Secretary of War shall have the discretion to pay $50,000 or $85,000. Upon this point it appears there is a difference between two members of the Committee on the District of Columbia. But how is the Committee of the Whole to judge which of these propositions is correct? The question presented is simply whether we shall give to the Secretary of War the discretion to expend, if he deems it necessary, the larger sum named—$85,000. It seems to me further discussion on this point is idle. If there is a division of opinion in the Committee on the District of Columbia, I think we certainly ought to give the Secretary of War, in the power which we confer upon him, the benefit of the doubt implied in that division of opinion. I trust, therefore, that the amendment proposed to cut down this sum from $85,000 to $50,000 will not be adopted.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the debate on this bill to learn the necessity for its passage and to hear some reason submitted to the committee why another bridge should be built across the Potomac, and thus far I have heard nothing that tends to show the necessity or propriety of expending this large sum. We are told by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOLLETT] that the commissioners of the District do not ask for the erection of this bridge. We are told by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JOHN S. WISE] that the people of Virginia want it, but I fail to hear anything showing that the people of the United States want it or need it.

Is it necessary? If so, why? Gentlemen submit that a bill was passed at the last session of Congress authorizing its construction, and contend that therefore it is necessary. In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, that does not follow. It does not follow because one Congress passes a bill to erect a bridge that its erection is necessary and we ought to increase the appropriation. If no better reason exists for the erection of this bridge than has yet been given, my judgment is that we should not only decline to increase the appropriation but we ought to repeal the act heretofore passed.

What is the necessity for it? Can no one answer? Who is it to serve?

Mr. BARBOUR. The District of Columbia.

Mr. CRISP. How is it to serve the District of Columbia? Have they not bridges already? Some gentleman says it is for the purpose of going to Arlington. You can go there now. I have been there over the bridge.

Mr. SHELLEY. Did you have to pay?

Mr. CRISP. Of course, I paid a small toll. Why should we furnish a bridge connecting the District of Columbia with Virginia when Virginia does not pay a dollar of the cost? The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JOHN S. WISE] told you what Virginia wanted. He told you where the roads converged in Virginia, and he told you that was the point where the bridge ought to be built. Why? Did he tell you because it would benefit the District? Not at all, but because the people of Virginia wanted it there. That is the proposition.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. If the gentleman will allow me I will respond to that inquiry.

Mr. CRISP. If I misrepresented the gentleman I will be glad to yield to him to be corrected.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. I thought the Government of the United States for a long time had shown such a desire to get into Virginia they would like to have the best way to get there. And I thought a bridge which connected the capital with one of the States of the Union was more or less an international idea, and I did not feel it necessary for me every time I got up on this floor to give renewed assurances that we of Virginia were a part of the Union.

Mr. CRISP. That has nothing to do with this bill. This is a matter of business.

Now, I ask this committee again what reason has been given why this bridge should be built at the cost of the United States? I think we have now two bridges crossing from the District to the Virginia shore.

Mr. BARBOUR. One is a railroad bridge and the other is eight miles off.

Mr. CRISP. Suppose it is eight miles off, can not the people go to it and cross? Why should we spend $220,000 to make it a little more convenient for the people of Virginia to come here? It seems to me the bridge is more for the benefit of those people than it is for the people of the District, and yet the chief beneficiaries are not to pay one dollar of the cost.

I understand the United States pays one-half of the expenses of the District, and there is some reason for that; but why should we pay money from the Treasury of the United States for an enterprise that a few of the people of Virginia want? The District commissioners do not want it now; they need their revenues for other purposes; and yet we propose by this bill to force them to contribute to the building of this bridge. I protest against it; there is no necessity for it, and there are many reasons why we should not do it.

One gentleman of the committee says they differ with the commissioners and therefore recommended this bill. I respectfully submit to this committee that the commissioners of this District, being specially charged with the administration of affairs here, and having doubtless carefully investigated this subject, are likely to know more about the necessities, wants, and requirements of the people of the District than the members of a committee who are here only for a few months. Not being furnished with any satisfactory reason why this large appropriation should be made, I am compelled to oppose this bill. If there appeared a real necessity for the proposed bridge I would be in favor on proper conditions of aiding in its erection; but it occurs to me that it is not right to spend the people's money on an enterprise like this when it is not demanded by the necessities of the case, and when the authorized heads of the people for whose benefit alone we are authorized to make the appropriation tell us they do not desire its construction at this time.

Mr. LAIRD. I should like to ask some member of the committee a question. I will ask the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW]. I should like him to state why the site at the Three Sisters was selected. I understand they are rocks in the river above Georgetown; but why were they selected?

Mr. MULDROW. The reason is this: There are certain islands in the center of the Potomac River known as the Three Sisters; they are rocky and furnish not only the best but the cheapest foundation for the piers to be erected for the superstructure of this bridge. It is the most eligible and economical point near Georgetown for the people there, for whom in the main this bridge is being erected. The people are compelled to pay toll going across the river on the Aqueduct Bridge. The people in the neighborhood who bring their produce to Georgetown are compelled to pay toll as well as those who come across that bridge to Washington. The people of Georgetown, indeed, have to pay additional on everything transported back or forth over that bridge. And therefore it is important to that people that this bridge should be built. This location, the Three Sisters, has been selected on account of the cheapness with which the bridge can be built in comparison to what it would cost at any other suitable place, because of these islands in the middle of the river upon which the piers can be more cheaply and more rapidly constructed. Besides that, the approaches to the bridge are considered to be excellent.

Mr. LAIRD. The bill is predicated upon investigations made by the engineers?

Mr. MULDROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. LAIRD. And after examination of the bottom of the river at that point?

Mr. MULDROW. I think so.

Mr. BARBOUR. I will explain to the gentleman from Nebraska as to that point.

Mr. LAIRD. I will give way to the gentleman from Virginia in a few minutes. For the present I wish to say a word upon another point in connection with this subject.

Some gentleman on the floor made during this debate a remark which from my standpoint I regard as peculiarly pertinent—that perhaps to this Congress the needs of the municipalities of Georgetown and Washington do not afford so strong a motive cause for the erection of this bridge as the fact that the people of the whole United States are concerned in the question of having opened to them an easy, direct, and practicable route to the national cemetery at Arlington. That route should be opened free to all, and I am ready to vote for the passage of such a measure; for in my judgment there should be no obstruction to the accessibility of that point. I am ready to contribute, so far as my vote goes, to the erection of a public improvement which shall open up a practicable, easy route to that cemetery. I find every day of my life here that somebody comes and asks to be shown the route to the national cemetery. They are advised that there are two modes of access to it, either by going across the Long Bridge, where they are in danger of trouble to their teams, owing to the fact that the cars cross that bridge and the noise of the locomotive is likely to frighten horses, or, on the other hand, they can have the privilege of crossing in the neighborhood of Georgetown, providing they are willing to pay a tribute to some corporation whose existence I know nothing of.

Now, then, I would like to ask the Committee on the District of Columbia why it is necessary to go, if they have any other answer to make, to a point a mile or a mile and a half above Georgetown and two miles or two and a half miles from the center of the city, to find a point where you can fling a bridge across the river, thereby necessitating considerable travel on this side as well as on the other side of the river to reach this point of national interest to the United States?

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. As a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia I wish to state that I visited the several bridges now existing and examined this point known as the Three Sisters, where it is proposed to erect this new bridge. I visited them in company with the president of the board of commissioners of the District of Columbia. It has been correctly stated by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD] that the only means at present of passing from the District of Columbia over to the Virginia side, the only access from this side of the river to the national cemetery, is over either the Long Bridge, which is in itself a railroad bridge and dangerous to cross on account of trains, or over the Aqueduct Bridge, in Georgetown, which is a toll-bridge, and where the rates are exorbitant. I agree with him that there should be free access to the national cemetery for citizens who want to pass and repass, visiting the Government property on the other side of the river, as well as to allow people visiting this city to bring their produce and their articles from the Virginia side of the river to the markets here. This free access is something which not alone the city of Georgetown, not the people of Virginia, as the gentleman from Virginia has said, but the whole people of the District of Columbia need, and in which they are interested; and so far as the cemetery is concerned I may say it is a matter of interest to the people of this country. All are interested in having free access to that great cemetery.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Then I will take the floor now in my own right, since I have exhausted the remainder of his time.

I was going on to say, sir, that there are but these two bridges which I have named now existing to afford means of access to the other side of the river, the Long Bridge and the Aqueduct Bridge, which is a toll-bridge. The only other point where a bridge can be constructed at a reasonable cost is at the Three Sisters, and I will tell the gentleman the reason why that is so. If you will visit the Aqueduct Bridge you will find piers which probably in their masonry and construction are equal to any bridge in this country. The information I have had from persons familiar with the subject enables me to say that when the Government undertook to erect this bridge it was found necessary to go so far below the bed of the stream to reach a solid foundation that the construction of the piers alone cost in the neighborhood of a half-million of dollars.

At the point known as the Three Sisters, about a half-mile above Georgetown, the river is very narrow and is likewise very deep. At the Three Sisters there are rocks about midway in the river, one of which can be utilized for the erection of a pier, and the immense expenditure found necessary in the construction of the piers of the Aqueduct Bridge will be obviated.

The Engineer Department, after an examination of the subject, reported in favor of utilizing one of these rocks, and it was estimated that the entire construction at that point need not exceed the sum of $220,000. There are, it is manifest, strong reasons, therefore, for the construction of the bridge at that place. It is the only place where a bridge can be constructed for such a sum. It is the only point hereabouts where the bridge can be erected for any moderate sum.

Mr. LAIRD. I desire to ask the gentleman a question there. It is proposed to make an appropriation of an additional sum of $80,000, as I understand, for the purpose of purchasing the bridge structure known as the Aqueduct Bridge. Now, if that be purchased, is it the idea of the committee that the construction of the bridge at the Three Sisters shall be abandoned?

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Yes, sir; because the Aqueduct Bridge is located so as to be far more convenient to the people of the District of Columbia, and I believe from what I have seen in visiting that point far more convenient to the people of Virginia. The roads center at that point; whereas at Three Sisters there is a bluff on the District side of the river and a bluff on the Virginia side, and considerable money would have to be expended in making approaches at that point.

Mr. BLOUNT. If I am not turning the gentleman from West Virginia from the course of his argument I would like to make an inquiry at this point.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I will hear the gentleman's question and answer it if I can.

Mr. BLOUNT. One of the amendments which I believe has been agreed to provides the bridge to be built where the Aqueduct Bridge is now shall be of sufficient strength to sustain the aqueduct.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Yes. The aqueduct conveys the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal to the city of Alexandria.

Mr. BLOUNT. So I understand. But by this amendment for all future time the Government is bound to keep the bridge not only for the accommodation of the people passing at that point into and out of the District, but they are bound to keep such a structure as will sustain the aqueduct.

Mr. SHELLEY. The piers support the aqueduct, and then the part between the two piers is suspended from the bridge.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand that. But I understand also from the reading of the amendment that the bridge is to be constructed not solely for the purpose of allowing people to pass from the Virginia side to the District side and vice versa with their wagons and conveyances, but that it must be a structure of sufficient strength to sustain the aqueduct below.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. The aqueduct is already there.

Mr. BLOUNT. But the amendment contemplates the bridge is to be built of sufficient strength to sustain the aqueduct. So that you give to the company not only this sum of money, but a guarantee that you will always keep a bridge there of sufficient strength not only for the purposes of travelers but for their own commercial purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia has expired. Does the gentleman from Georgia claim the floor?

Mr. BLOUNT. I rose simply to ask some questions for information from the gentleman from West Virginia whose time has now expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia can now proceed in his own right, if he so desires, for five minutes.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] desires the floor.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I rose to take the floor to make the inquiry whether under that amendment the Government would be committed to maintaining the canal on those piers?

Mr. SHELLEY. No, sir. The amendment expressly stipulates that it shall be at the cost of the canal company.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Without committing the Government to any expense in regard to it?

Mr. BLOUNT. It is more than that. It is an obligation of the United States to make a bridge of sufficient strength not only for the accommodation of the persons using the bridge but for the use of the canal company in having the aqueduct suspended therefrom.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If there is any partnership under that amendment between that corporation and the Government, whereby the Government is obligated to contribute anything to the maintenance of the aqueduct, I am opposed to it. I am willing the corporation should have the right to maintain its own aqueduct on these piers, because I conceive the piers are strong enough to support the aqueduct.

Mr. MULDROW. That is all there is in the bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But if the Government is bound to contribute to the maintenance of the aqueduct I am opposed to it. I understood, however, from gentlemen of the committee the Government is not obligated at all. I wish gentlemen would make that plain.

Mr. MULDROW. The right reserved to the Alexandria Canal Company is that they shall have the right to hang their aqueduct from the piers of the bridge which they now use. That is the only reservation.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is as I have understood it. Does it require the Government to construct a bridge to which they may attach the aqueduct?

Mr. BLOUNT. To settle this matter I will read the language of the amendment itself:

> It is further provided that the Alexandria Canal Company or its present lessees shall have the right to maintain at their own cost and expense a canal aqueduct of the same width and depth as the one now in use, and to attach it to or suspend it from the said bridge, and whenever a permanent bridge shall be erected upon said site the same shall be of sufficient strength to sustain the canal trunk or aqueduct.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I see that does commit the Government to maintaining a bridge there of sufficient strength to support that aqueduct for a private corporation. I do not think the Government should enter into any such partnership as that.

Mr. BARBOUR. The proposition is for the Government to come in and buy a right to build a bridge on these piers. When they come to do that they find the bridge already occupied with a trunk or aqueduct which is suspended from the present bridge. The two things are necessarily associated. When the Government comes to put its new bridge there in buying the canal company out and getting this cheap site for a bridge they must make some concession to allow this trunk to be maintained which is to be connected to some extent with the bridge. But the amendment also provides that the maintaining of that aqueduct or trunk shall be at the expense and cost of the Alexandria Canal Company.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If the gentleman from Virginia will allow me, the distinction is right here. I do not remember just now distinctly the present plan. But if it were only to permit the aqueduct to be sustained on these piers, and it could be sustained on the piers independently of the bridge, the piers being now strong enough to support the aqueduct and the bridge, I should have no objection. But to obligate the Government to construct this bridge in such a manner as to support the aqueduct for this company and of sufficient strength for that purpose, it seems to me would be a source of trouble to ourselves in the future.

Mr. BARBOUR. Of course the gentleman must see the canal company would not consent to have this aqueduct destroyed. If by building this bridge you should destroy the aqueduct, there should be some provision made to prevent such destruction. The gentleman from Ohio can move any amendment which he thinks is necessary.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If the proposition is that the Government shall construct a bridge strong enough to suspend this canal aqueduct to it, then I think that is a partnership which the Government should not enter into.

Mr. SHELLEY. The present bridge, which is a very frail structure, is sufficient to support the aqueduct; and of course the kind of bridge which the Government should build for its own purposes would sustain the weight of the aqueduct. There will be no increased cost to the Government, no increased responsibility, for the structure which will be necessary for the purpose will support the aqueduct.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gentleman does not mean to say that it will require a bridge of no more strength to carry an aqueduct than for a public highway. If in addition to its own weight the bridge must be strong enough to sustain the canal, of course it must be stronger than for a highway simply.

Mr. SHELLEY. The gentleman must understand that this aqueduct rests on the piers, and it is suspended to the bridge only in the spaces between the piers.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And that is just the reason why the bridge should be made stronger.

Mr. SHELLEY. Of course; and the necessary strength for such a bridge will be sufficient to support the aqueduct without any trouble.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Of course, if you make the bridge strong enough, but that will add to the cost and will make the Government a partner with the aqueduct company owning the bridge.

Mr. LAIRD. I would inquire what we are to get for this $85,000 to be paid to the Aqueduct Company?

Mr. BARBOUR. The use of the piers.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It seems to me that the company should pay the Government something for building a bridge to which they can swing their aqueduct.

Mr. SHELLEY. Yes; but the present bridge is acknowledged to be frail and will not last many years.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think we have had experience enough with this canal company to be a little cautious in what we do. I hold in my hand the report of Colonel Abert, United States civil engineer, from which it appears that the Government now has 3,000 shares in this canal company. Those shares were obtained in this way: The Government advanced money to the canal company and was secured by 3,000 shares of the stock of the company. The Government has those shares of the stock as collateral, and I am told that that stock is utterly worthless. That was our first experience with this company; the stock is not worth a nickel to-day.

We now have another proposition to pay this company $85,000 for the use of these piers, a company whose stock is utterly worthless. We are to pay this company, or to pay the lessees of the company, $85,000 for the use of these piers on which we are to construct a bridge.

And it is carefully provided in this bill that we are to construct a bridge of sufficient strength from which this canal aqueduct can be suspended. The very fact that the bill is so carefully guarded is suggestive of the necessity of the construction of a new bridge at an early day. I apprehend that the present bridge is a very poor one; my information has been that it is an old bridge and out of repair. One of the reasons why Congress is called upon to pass a law authorizing the construction of a new bridge is the inadequacy of this present bridge.

I remember the debate, for I was here at the time, upon the proposition to build a bridge. We had no reason to apprehend that a bridge was to be built for any other purpose than for the transit between this District and Virginia. As the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] has said, I do not want any proposition which will bring the Government into partnership with the canal company in this matter.

I have seen the Government tricked too often by such propositions. I do not mean by that that the honorable gentlemen who support this proposition on this floor would do anything knowingly to injure the Government. Indeed, I have not the slightest suspicion that the gentlemen who are advocating this proposition would be capable of recommending any legislation that in their opinion was unfavorable to the Government. But I have seen so often plausible propositions pass through this House, and then a few years afterward we have learned that they involved some job.

As said by my friend and colleague from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], I do not see why we should be in any great haste about this matter. I certainly can see why this bill should not pass with this provision in it. The District commissioners, who have never been scrupulous in their economy, who have the power of assessing taxes in this District, tell you that the interests of the people who are to be taxed are of such a character that expenditures for a bridge should be made in quite another direction.

By the organic act of the District these commissioners are required to submit to Congress estimates of what is needed to be done. I hold that under that organic act it was almost incompetent for the Committee on the District of Columbia to come in here with such a proposition as this without the recommendation of the District commissioners, when the law expressly contemplated that Congress should first know the wants of the District through those commissioners.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JEFFORDS. As a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia I believe I am entitled to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been exhausted upon the amendment.

Mr. JEFFORDS. I move to strike out the last word. This matter was discussed a great deal in the committee. From the first my own mind was in favor of the proposition to build a free bridge at the Three Sisters. This discussion, especially the remarks made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], and the gentleman from Georgia who has just taken his seat [Mr. BLOUNT], have convinced me that my first impression in regard to this matter was right.

Nor do I believe that the Government should enter into any contract with other parties in regard to this matter. It seems to me the Government should build a bridge and own it. If the proposition giving the Secretary of War discretion to purchase the Aqueduct Bridge should be persisted in I believe we shall have no free bridge at all. It is better to spend $220,000 than to attempt to save the $20,000 which it is said might be saved by making the arrangement proposed.

In the Committee on the District of Columbia I yielded an unwilling assent to this provision giving to the Secretary of War discretion to buy this Aqueduct Bridge. But the discussion here to-day has developed the fact that it is dangerous for the Government to undertake to build such a structure or superstructure as will uphold the aqueduct. This, I think, has been demonstrated by the gentleman from Ohio. Hence, though I subscribed to this provision of the bill in committee, I believe we had better return to the simple proposition recommended so often by the Government engineers—that we should build a free bridge at the Three Sisters. The matter will then be stripped of all incumbrances, all negotiations, and we shall understand exactly what we are doing.

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD].

Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the Government, in General Jackson's time, built the Long Bridge. Now it transpires that this bridge, built by the Government, is owned by railroad companies. I would like to inquire whether the Committee on the District of Columbia ever took into consideration the extinguishment of the easements of the railroad companies in the Long Bridge, because if we have one bridge open to foot-passengers and vehicles, that is enough.

After the Government has built the Long Bridge the title turns up in the railroad companies. It is proposed that we shall buy the Aqueduct Bridge, and the title will turn up in a canal company. I am opposed to that sort of an arrangement upon business principles. We can, as I understand from the statement of the gentleman from Virginia, get nothing more than an easement in the property of this corporation, and a lawsuit in connection with the easement, I suppose.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. MCCOMAS to strike out "$85,000" and insert "$50,000," it was not agreed to.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I move to amend the bill by striking out all after the word "inserted," in line 45, down to the colon in line 49, and inserting, after the words "to be," in line 49, these words: "posted in each and every free-delivery post-office in the United States." I move further to amend by striking out, in line 50, the word "fifteen" and inserting "five," so that the amount will be $5,000 instead of $15,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read the amendment:

Mr. MULDROW. I make a point of order upon the amendment. I understand that the portion of the bill to which it relates has been passed by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I do not so understand. If I am wrong, then of course the gentleman is correct in his point of order. As I understand, the whole bill is open to amendment in any clause or line.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order well taken. The portion of the bill to which the gentleman proposes his amendment has been agreed to in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Then I move to amend by striking out the last word. This proposition to appropriate $15,000 to be immediately available for investigating and making surveys relative to the location of this bridge between the District of Columbia and the State of Virginia is a question that should be carefully considered. If this bridge is to be built, why should the United States build it? That is the question which arises in my mind. Why should not the State of Virginia pay one-half of the whole expense, and why should not the District of Columbia pay one-half of the remainder?

A MEMBER. They do.

Mr WHITE, of Kentucky. Is Virginia to pay one-half of the cost of constructing this bridge? Not at all.

Mr. BARBOUR. I will say to the gentleman that the State of Virginia has comparatively little interest in this bridge.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. As I understood the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JOHN S. WISE] there are at least two counties of that State very much interested in having the bridge erected at the Three Sisters.

Mr. TUCKER. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I will yield for a question.

Mr. TUCKER. Not for a question, but for an answer.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The gentleman can take the floor when I am through.

Mr. TUCKER. I want to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Very well.

Mr. TUCKER. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky what I believe to be entirely true, that the constitution of the State of Virginia forbids that State to make appropriations for any such improvements as this bill contemplates.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I can only say that this is a very cheap answer. It does not cost the State of Virginia a cent to respond to that.

Mr. TUCKER. It may be a cheap answer, but if the gentleman from Kentucky understands that the obligations of the constitution are cheap, then he will probably understand the answer a little better.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I can very readily understand the gentleman's obligations to the State of Virginia; but let me ask him what is his obligation to the nation? Is he to be particular about the money of the State of Virginia but lavish as to the funds belonging to the nation?

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow a suggestion?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Certainly I will yield to the handsome gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. TUCKER. I accept the discrimination. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. It was marked without my making it. I did not make it myself.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. In answer to the suggestions of the gentleman from Kentucky, I want to state that I have never understood that the State of Virginia proposed to have anything to do whatever with the construction of this bridge. Certainly the proposition to build it by the State never has been made that I am aware of; and I can shrewdly guess that if it had been made it would have been rejected. I understood that the policy of building the bridge was determined upon by the United States Government, and the question was where should it be located. I understand further that the object in building it is to give the people in the neighborhood of this capital an opportunity to come to the city, as well as to give persons who desire it access to Arlington and the other Government property on that side of the river. I never pretended to say that Virginia was interested in the matter, but simply that the people in certain counties proximate to the bridge would be more convenienced by its location if it was placed higher up the river than if placed below the Aqueduct Bridge. I suppose when a man builds a bridge he consults the convenience of the people who are to cross it, and I do not see what Virginia's interest is in the matter further than that, for she does not propose to build it now or at any time hereafter.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The gentleman from Virginia has changed his tune since he made his first speech. When he spoke before it was for the benefit of the people in two counties in Virginia. Now he speaks for the benefit of the people who want to visit the Government property over the river. Before he drew a contrast between his own people in Alexandria, who derived benefit from passing over by the present old bridge, and showed that there was a job in that arrangement; and also spoke in behalf of the people in two of the counties of Virginia above the bridge, and in favor of the location in their interest at a point as close to them as possible, the Three Sisters.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. SHELLEY. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "law," in line 18 of section 2:

"Provided further, That if the Secretary shall fail to procure a good title as above within the said sixty days, he shall proceed at once to construct a bridge at the Three Sisters."

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I make the point of order that the bill is not subject to such amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is in order at this point in the bill.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I offer an amendment to come in at the place of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama. It is at the same point in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. It can not be offered now as a pending amendment.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Could it be read for information?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment may be read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in line 18, after the word "law," down to line 24, after the word "Aqueduct," and insert:

"It is further provided that as long as the Government maintains said bridge the Alexandria Canal Company or its present lessees shall have the right to maintain at their own cost and expense a canal aqueduct of the same width and depth as the one now in use, and to attach or suspend it from the piers of the bridge."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I would suggest to the gentleman the words, "supported from the piers," rather than the words used in the amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is that a pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Alabama is the pending amendment. The other was read for information.

Mr. SHELLEY. If in order to do so I am willing to make that a part of the amendment which I have offered—couple the two together and make them one amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question then will be taken upon the two propositions combined.

Mr. BLOUNT. The language is quite different. I do not know that the obligation of the Government is at all changed.

Mr. SHELLEY. It is simply two provisos coupled together.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The amendment offered, as I understand, by the committee materially changes the proposition. The piers, as I understand, as now constructed are strong enough to support both a highway bridge and an aqueduct. Now this continues the right to the aqueduct company to use the same piers for the support of their aqueduct as now, and leaves the Government free, at any time it may elect to do so, to construct a new road bridge independently of the aqueduct, thus relieving the Government entirely from any obligation to support an aqueduct or a bridge from which an aqueduct shall be suspended; at the same time it leaves the right to the present canal company to use the piers. To that I see no objection myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SHELLEY] as modified by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to have the amendment as now modified read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That if the Secretary shall fail to procure a good title as above within the said sixty days he shall proceed at once to construct a bridge at the Three Sisters. It is further provided that as long as the Government maintains said bridge the Alexandria Canal Company or its present lessees shall have the right to maintain at their own cost and expense a canal aqueduct of the same width and depth as the one now in use and to attach or suspend it to the piers of said bridge.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHELLEY. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the amendments.

Mr. FOLLETT. I hope that motion will not prevail.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I move to strike out the last word. I made a proposition a while ago, which was decided to be not in order; but I desire to make a few remarks upon it.

Mr. FOLLETT. Mr. Chairman, am I recognized?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thought the gentleman from Ohio had yielded the floor.

Mr. FOLLETT. No, sir; I want to be heard for a few moments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOLLETT] will proceed.

Mr. FOLLETT. In the preparation of the District appropriation bill our object was to try to bring the expenditures of the District of Columbia within the amount of money we had to appropriate without at all taking into account the construction of this bridge, and the work which I did has been considerably reduced by the Appropriations Committee, and still for the purpose of properly conducting the affairs of the District of Columbia and keeping within the limits of the money there is to appropriate, we find it is absolutely essential to deny a great many things which I think ought to be allowed if there was money to do it, and most of which I deem much more important than the construction of this bridge.

I am not alone in this view. The authorities in this District, the commissioners of the District of Columbia, believe this is not the time to build this bridge or to make appropriations from the funds of the District for this purpose. If this bill passes there is substantially appropriated from $200,000 to $220,000, to be taken one-half of it out of the funds raised in the District of Columbia and applied to the building of a bridge which I undertake to say not one in a hundred of the people of the District will have occasion to use in the next ten years. I may be a little out of my reckoning in that calculation, but I have not yet heard that there is an absolutely essential necessity for the construction of the bridge.

There is a necessity of improving the streets. There is a necessity of improving the sewerage system of the District; a necessity that applies to the health, happiness, and prosperity of the District. There are no approaches as yet constructed to a bridge to be built at the Three Sisters; and this bill provides that the State of Virginia shall make those approaches if we build the bridge. Further than that, sir, there is no provision in this bill by which we have any right to go into Virginia to build the piers at the other end of the bridge.

The entire expense of this bridge is placed upon the District of Columbia and the Government of the United States, and that too without there being money to pay for it, unless you take it off your streets and off your sewers and appropriate it to this purpose. This is the only flexible part of the expenditure of the District of Columbia from which it can be taken. There is an eyesore here southeast of the Capitol. All over the city is a demand for the improvement of the streets and the placing of them in such a condition as to make them desirable to live upon. In view of that, without any request from the District or the District authorities, this Congress, of its own motion and by the action of its committee, proposes to build this bridge. I always desire to pay due respect to committees when they act in obedience to a request of the people affected; but when they act independently of that I think each member of this House is placed upon his own responsibility in determining whether or not the appropriation shall be made. If this bridge is built, if this appropriation is made, it is necessary that the expenditures necessary for the improvement of streets, for the improvement of sewers, and for securing the proper sanitary condition of the city should be ordered to stop or be largely reduced.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I beg pardon of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOLLETT] for rising when he had the floor. I supposed he had simply risen to object to laying aside the bill for favorable action, without desiring to debate. In furtherance of what the gentleman from Ohio has said, I desire to call the attention of the committee again to the fact that we ought not to pass this bill until we put into it a clause that the State of Virginia shall pay one-half of the expense incurred in the construction of this bridge. I insist upon this not only to protect the Treasury of the United States but to protect the citizens of the District.

As has been well said by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOLLETT], we are entailing an expense upon the District by passing this bill of $110,000. But I insist that you should put a proviso in the bill that the Secretary of War shall expend none of the money hereby appropriated until the authorities of the State of Virginia shall have given guarantees satisfactory to the Secretary of War that they will pay one-half of the cost of the construction of this bridge, will open and construct the necessary roads to connect the said bridge with the highways of that State, and keep said roads in good repair and open for free travel. Until that is done we ought not to pass this bill. If we do that we will then save to the District of Columbia $55,000, which can go to the improvement of the streets, &c., of the city.

Mr. GOFF. I would ask the gentleman from what he has been reading?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I read from the bill as I want to have it amended. I read the amendment which I think should be put in the bill, providing that the Secretary should not expend any of this money until he had assurances from the State of Virginia that that State would pay one-half of the cost of this bridge; that the State of Virginia shall build roads to connect with the bridge, keep them in good repair and free for travel.

I would add to the bill a provision that the Secretary of War shall not expend any of this money for this purpose until the State of Virginia obligates herself to pay one-half of the cost of this bridge. If the constitution of the State of Virginia will not allow her to do that, then let us wait until the State of Virginia changes her constitution. The people of that State are to derive one-half of the benefit of this bridge, and why should the Treasury of the United States be required to pay all the bills? That is a very liberal proposition to come from the senior member from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR].

That gentleman says that the constitution of Virginia will not permit the Legislature of Virginia to appropriate any money for any such purpose. So much the worse for the State of Virginia; her constitution ought to allow it. Her citizens are to derive the benefit of this bridge, as was very plainly portrayed by the very handsome gentleman from Virginia.

Besides, the proposals for building this bridge are to be advertised for in a few newspapers. It seems that this is not only to be for the benefit of a few people in Virginia and to tourists in the city of Washington, all to be provided at Government expense, but it is to be for the benefit also of a few newspapers. Listen to the wording of the bill:

The Secretary of War shall * * * advertise for plans and price for the construction of said bridge, such advertisement to be inserted in one or more daily newspapers published in Washington, D. C.

How many daily newspapers are there in Washington? There are four of them, and every one of them would come in for a share of this appropriation. But it does not stop at Washington. The Secretary is to advertise also in "one or more daily newspapers published in * * * New York, Cleveland, Detroit, Philadelphia, Chicago, Saint Louis, Richmond." Under that he may advertise in every daily newspaper in those cities. Then there is to be appropriated $15,000 for a survey which ought not to cost more than $2,000.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I do not propose to answer the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE], because he has been discussing a portion of the bill which the Committee of the Whole has already passed upon. But on behalf of the Committee on the District of Columbia I want to say a word or two in response to the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOLLETT].

That gentleman would have us believe that this is a matter for which the authorities of the District of Columbia have not asked, for which the people of the District have not asked; that it is simply some scheme devised and matured in the room of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and which Congress is asked to pass without anybody having asked it to take any such action. Whatever may be the views of the commissioners of the District of Columbia on this matter (and I do not believe their views are such as the gentleman would have us suppose), I know this fact as a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, that from all sections of this District there has been a demand for this bridge; that there has come from this District petition after petition to the committee and to the House asking for the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at this point.

Not only has it been asked for by the people of the District, whether their rulers desire it or not, but it is a matter of convenience for the people of Washington and of the District. I say to the honorable gentlemen from Ohio and Kentucky that I consider it a disgrace that the mothers and orphans of soldiers coming here from different sections of the country can not get to Arlington where their fathers and brothers are buried without their meeting this tax now in force over the Aqueduct Bridge. I believe the Government owes it to them to give free access to the cemetery at Arlington.

But I do not believe the objection of the gentleman from Ohio will apply to the bill as now proposed by the committee. There is already in force an act of Congress appropriating $140,000 to build a bridge at the Three Sisters. I know from personal observation that that is not the best point for the location of a bridge. However it might accommodate a few residents and farmers on the Virginia side of the river, it will not accommodate the people of the District of Columbia as a bridge located at the aqueduct would do.

This bill as now prepared by the committee proposes to allow the commissioners of the District of Columbia, by the present expenditure of only $100,000 ($40,000 less than the amount already appropriated and $50,000 of which will come out of the revenues of the District of Columbia), to acquire this Aqueduct Bridge, located at a point far more accessible and convenient for the people of the District than would be a bridge at any other point. This bridge can be thrown open and made a free bridge, over which the marketing from the other side of the river can come to the District of Columbia, and over which the people of the District can go free, and which will provide free and convenient access to the national cemetery at Arlington.

Mr. SHELLEY. I ask that we now have a vote.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. SHELLEY. It is getting late.

Mr. BLOUNT. I know it is getting late, but it is never too late to examine carefully any proposition to appropriate the people's money.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been exhausted upon the pending amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to amend by striking out the last two words. In 1878 the Congress of the United States provided that one-half of the expenditures for the District of Columbia should be paid out of the Federal Treasury and the other half by taxation upon the people of the District. The very next year after the adoption of that provision this Government paid out of the Treasury of the United States as its share more money than had been expended upon this District from the beginning of the Government through a period of more than seventy years.

At the time of the passage of that act of 1878 great abuses had occurred in District affairs. Congress knew the local influences which might impress the minds of members in reference to matters relating to the District of Columbia; and in order to establish careful guards in this direction they put into the organic act this language:

> The said commissioners shall submit to the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and annually thereafter, for his examination and approval, a statement showing in detail the work proposed to be undertaken by them during the fiscal year next ensuing and the estimated cost thereof; also the cost of constructing, repairing, and maintaining all bridges authorized by law across the Potomac River within the District of Columbia, and also all other streams in said District.

What is the Secretary of the Treasury to do after estimate has been made for the construction of bridges? The very thing we have under consideration. The next step to be taken by the Secretary of the Treasury is thus prescribed:

> The Secretary of the Treasury shall carefully consider all estimates submitted to him as above provided, and shall approve, disapprove, or suggest such changes in the same, or any item thereof, as he may think the public interest demands; and after he shall have considered and passed upon such estimates submitted to him, he shall cause to be made a statement of the amount approved by him and the fund or purpose to which each item belongs, which statement shall be certified by him, and delivered, together with the estimates as originally submitted, to the commissioners of the District of Columbia, who shall transmit the same to Congress. To the extent to which Congress shall approve of said estimates Congress shall appropriate the amount of 50 per cent. thereof; and the remaining 50 per cent. of such approved estimates shall be levied and assessed upon the taxable property and privileges in said District other than the property of the United States and of the District of Columbia.

These are the provisions of the organic act of 1878. Congress, understanding the liability that members might be imposed upon or deceived and that thus improper legislation might be procured, threw out these outworks——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HARDEMAN. Believing that my colleague [Mr. BLOUNT] is on the right line, I yield my time to him.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am much obliged to my colleague.

Congress, I say, threw out these safeguards, requiring that before any expenditure of this kind should be made—before, if you please, a bridge should be constructed—the District commissioners should consider the question; that their estimate should be submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury for his examination and approval; that it should be by him brought to the attention of Congress, and that when this had been done we should pass upon the question.

But, sir, we are abandoning these safeguards. A proposition is reported and urged here to build a bridge, although the gentleman from Cincinnati [Mr. FOLLETT] tells this House that the District commissioners declare the undertaking is not a proper one to be entered upon at this time; that there are other conveniences and necessities of the people of the District to be provided for, and they suggest a postponement of this bridge.

Why should we not pay regard to the recommendation of the commissioners? What necessity is there for the construction of this bridge at the present time? Why should we not heed the advice of the commissioners, who, under the law of the land and by the appointment of the President of the United States, are specially charged with making recommendations of this character, who represent the people of this District, who are to pay one-half the expense of this structure?

Is there any great commercial necessity for this bridge? In some cases free bridges are important to a city in a commercial point of view, and for this reason the people of a city sometimes see fit to tax themselves for such structures. But can it be said that there is any reason of that kind in this case? Our information from the proper official source is directly the reverse.

My friend from Virginia tells you that Virginia will never contribute anything for this bridge. Certainly she would do so if it were important to her citizens that the bridge be constructed. Even the counties immediately interested might be authorized to tax themselves for their proportion. But I say there is in this case no commercial necessity such as sometimes suggests the erection of free bridges. I can see no reason why the people may not continue for a time to pay the small tolls that are charged at present.

The District Committee in reporting this bill ignores the representation of the District commissioners, who inform members of Congress that there is no adequate necessity for the immediate construction of this bridge. Sir, I am not disposed to attach any special degree of weight to the recommendations of the District Committee when the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SHELLEY], a member of that committee, is so thoroughly identified with what I regard as a heresy in reference to this District as to repeat the statement, refuted time and again, that the United States own one-half of the property in this District. He admits that this property lies mainly in your streets and reservations, which the people here enjoy and which are utterly worthless except for purposes of that sort.

Mr. SHELLEY. The property of the Government is not entirely in streets and reservations.

Mr. BLOUNT. I did not so state; but the gentleman will admit that the great bulk of the property of this Government in this District lies in these beautiful highways and reservations——

Mr. SHELLEY. And public buildings.

Mr. BLOUNT. Oh, I know there are some public buildings——

Mr. SHELLEY. And public parks.

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, Mr. Speaker, the people of Washington do not have to provide and maintain their parks like the people of other cities——

Mr. SHELLEY. And fish-ponds and agricultural establishments——

Mr. BLOUNT. Well, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman sees fit to talk about "fish-ponds" and matters of that kind I am willing he should go on without reply.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SHELLEY. Mr. Speaker, the speech of the honorable gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] would have done very well in the original consideration of this question. Three years ago Congress had this matter under consideration. At that time it was carefully and patiently investigated, and the question was then determined after mature deliberation. The commissioners of this District appeared before the District Committee and recommended an appropriation of $140,000 for the construction of this bridge which they are now opposing.

Mr. MCMILLIN. And in that connection let me say that at that time it was stated the appropriation then made for the construction of this bridge would be all that would be asked for it; that it was all which was needed. Here now, however, we have an increase of appropriation of something like $80,000, making $220,000 in all.

Mr. SHELLEY. The committee have not disregarded the act of 1878 in this matter. They have acted upon the estimated cost, as reported from the Engineer Department of the United States Army. That estimate was made after surveys and careful investigation. The report was made to the Secretary of War, and by the Secretary transmitted to Congress. This being a matter in which the District of Columbia is not alone interested, we took the recommendation of the engineers in charge of the work, looking at it in its national as well as local aspect.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I rise long enough in opposition to the bill to call attention to a provision which requires that the State of Virginia shall give satisfactory guarantee to the Secretary of War to open the roads to connect with this bridge. But, sir, I see nothing in the bill requiring the State of Virginia to give title to the ground on which these piers must rest. Is there any provision of that sort or not required?

Mr. SHELLEY. The owners of the property on the other side of the river have obligated themselves to surrender the title to the ground for the location of the piers.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is it a sufficient title?

Mr. SHELLEY. It is. The right of way is granted to make approaches to the bridge. They are to be safe and convenient approaches in connection with the neighboring highways. In reference to the Aqueduct Bridge these things are already acquired. If that purchase is made that question is settled.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. SHELLEY. No, I can not. Now, this matter has been carefully investigated. The gentleman from Georgia says the expenses of this District are increasing. Yes, they are. The expenses of this House are also increasing. The expenses of the Doorkeeper of this House are more now than the whole expenses of the House of Representatives were forty years ago. Is that any good reason why we should fail to make the necessary appropriations for public purposes? The gentleman mistakes the age and time in which we live. We have to keep our expenditures up to the necessities of our progress and in accordance with our commerce and civilization.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Alabama, I desire to call his attention to the fact that the senior member from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER]——

Mr. SHELLEY. We are protracting this debate most unnecessarily, and I therefore ask for a vote on my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is entitled to the floor for five minutes.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The senior member from Virginia in the hearing of both sides of the House said under the constitution of that State the Legislature of Virginia was not permitted to make an appropriation for any part of the sum for the construction of this bridge. I desire to put this question to the gentleman from Virginia in my own time, as he would not allow me to do it in his time. If that be true, under what part of the constitution of Virginia do you expect that State will give satisfactory guarantees to the Secretary of War to construct and keep open the necessary roads to connect this bridge with the neighboring highways?

Mr. SHELLEY. The State of Virginia has not to do that, but it is done by the local communities.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The local communities have something to do with it. The gentleman from Alabama may be familiar with the constitution of Virginia and I am not. It has been stated by the senior and junior members from Virginia—the two handsome members from that State—that the constitution of that Commonwealth prohibited the Legislature from appropriating money for any such purpose as the construction of a bridge. It is provided here that the District of Columbia shall pay one-half and the United States the other half, but the State of Virginia is to pay nothing. In my judgment the State of Virginia, which is to get most of the benefit of this bridge, should pay $110,000, and the United States and the District of Columbia $55,000 each. I should like to have some more satisfactory explanation of this matter than we have yet had. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama withdraw his pro forma amendment?

Mr. SHELLEY. I do.

Mr. CANNON. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of calling the attention of gentlemen on this side of the House to the statement made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOLLETT], he having charge of the District of Columbia appropriation bill. There was some confusion at the time, and I fear it was not heard by gentlemen on this side of the House. This is a proposition to build a bridge and to appropriate some $80,000 in addition to the $140,000 heretofore appropriated.

Now, then, the gentleman from Ohio stated, and I want to enforce it, that there are works in progress in the city of Washington, and headway has been made upon them, of importance, that ought not be suspended; and he instanced the work on the streets and the construction of sewers. He showed that this work ought to be done in preference to the building of this bridge, and the proposed appropriation for the next fiscal year for this purpose is more than sufficient to exhaust the revenues for that year without this appropriation. Now, it is proper enough to build the bridge; but when you come to choose between the bridge and the other works that are in progress, I can see without more investigation that in my opinion the bridge ought to wait. That is all I wanted to say, and I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SHELLEY. I now insist upon my motion that the bill be laid aside and reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken. The committee divided; and there were—ayes 37, noes 63.

Mr. SHELLEY. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. SHELLEY and Mr. BLOUNT were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 48, noes 86.

Mr. SHELLEY. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have the Clerk to read the rule.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope that we may be permitted to continue to count until a quorum is obtained.

Mr. SHELLEY. Would it be in order to move that the committee do now rise?

The CHAIRMAN. It would.

Mr. BLOUNT. Not pending the count, would it?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask for the reading of the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will entertain the motion that the committee rise.

Mr. SHELLEY. What would be the effect?

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Alabama is counting the vote now.

Mr. SHELLEY. I ask what would be the effect of the motion? Would it have the effect of killing the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will announce that on this question the tellers report ayes 48, noes 87. No quorum has voted.

Mr. SHELLEY. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. VANCE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3810) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at the Three Sisters, near Georgetown, had come to no resolution thereon.

FUEL FOR HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution for reference to the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be authorized and directed to purchase by private contract, and without advertising therefor, twenty cords of best oak wood for immediate use of the House of Representatives, said purchase to be made under the direction of the Committee on Accounts, and the wood to be paid for out of the contingent fund of the House.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Accounts.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOLLETT, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. 6656) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations.

PURCHASE OF CERTAIN HOSPITAL RECORDS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress a communication from the Secretary of War of the 5th instant, submitting copies of certain papers, consisting of a letter dated February 16, last, from Mr. Houghwout Howe, of New York city, presenting a proposition for the sale to the Government for the sum of $5,500 of certain hospital and other records pertaining to an association founded in New York city in April, 1862, for the purpose of extending relief to soldiers of the late war; a report of an examination made of these records by a representative of the War Department, and a report of the Adjutant-General stating that the records would prove of great value to the Department in the settlement of claims of deserving soldiers, as well as in detecting fraudulent claims, as the books, &c., contain information not now of record in the War Department.

The Secretary of War, it will be observed, recommends that an appropriation be made by Congress of the necessary sum for the purchase of the records referred to.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 14, 1884.

PIÑA BLANCA LAND GRANT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a tracing of the plat of the survey of the private land claim of Juan Montes Virgil, known as the Piña Blanca Grant, New Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. FOLLETT, for the remainder of the week, on account of important business.

To Mr. SHELLEY, for ten days, on account of important business.

REPRINT OF A REPORT.

On motion of Mr. OATES, the report of the Committee on the Public Lands, declaring a forfeiture of lands granted to aid in the construction of the Northern Pacific Railroad, together with the views of the minority, was ordered to be reprinted for the use of the House.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WARNER, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 3956) to amend section 2527 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the district of Gloucester.

And then, on motion of Mr. BARBOUR (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 15, 1884.

Prayer by Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D., of Washington, D. C.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore signed the following enrolled bills, heretofore signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

A bill (S. 431) for the relief of Sallie A. Spence; and

A bill (S. 874) to further suspend the operation of section 5574 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, title 72, in relation to guano islands.

SEACOAST DEFENSES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The condition of our seacoast defenses and their armament has been brought to the attention of Congress in my annual messages, and I now submit a special estimate of the Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, transmitted by the Secretary of War, for a permanent annual appropriation of $1,500,000 to provide the necessary armament for our fortifications.

This estimate is founded upon the report of the gun-foundery board, recently transmitted, to which I have heretofore invited the early attention of Congress.

In presenting this estimate I do not think it necessary to enumerate the considerations which make it of the highest importance that there should be no unnecessary delay in entering upon the work, which must be commensurate with the public interests to be guarded and which will take much time.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 11, 1884.

MILITARY RECORDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress a communication from the Secretary of War of the 5th instant, submitting copies of certain papers, consisting of a letter dated February 16, last, from Mr. Houghwout Howe, of New York city, presenting a proposition for the sale to the Government for the sum of $5,500 of certain hospital and other records pertaining to an association founded in New York city in April, 1862, for the purpose of extending relief to soldiers of the late war; a report of an examination made of these records by a representative of the War Department, and a report of the Adjutant-General stating that the records would prove of great value to the Department in the settlement of claims of deserving soldiers, as well as in detecting fraudulent claims, as the books, &c., contain information not now of record in the Department.

The Secretary of War, it will be observed, recommends that an appropriation be made by Congress of the necessary sum for the purchase of the records referred to.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, submitting a plan and estimate for a fireproof building for an office suitable for the uses of the Signal Service; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the 1st instant, information relating to the office of marshal for the middle and southern districts of Alabama and concerning the person now exercising the duties of that office; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting a certified copy of the record in the case of Chairs et al. vs. The United States (the Arredondo grant, in Columbia County, Florida); which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a tracing of the plat of survey of unconfirmed private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico, No. 124, known as the Peña Blanca grant, Juan Montes Vigil, claimant.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This communication will be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, which will not be printed, being a mere tracing, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, urging such a modification of existing law as shall increase the amount [$500] determining the jurisdiction of the circuit court of the United States in certain cases commensurate with the increase of commercial interests and business of the courts and the demands of the people.

The Chair understands that a resolution identical with this was presented yesterday by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON]. If there be no objection, this joint resolution will be referred without further reading to the Committee on the Judiciary. All these papers are transmitted to the Chair officially, and the Chair therefore feels bound to lay them before the Senate.

The Chair presents a telegraphic copy, certified by the secretary of state, of a resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of California, urging the speedy passage of the Chinese immigration legislation now pending before Congress. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SACRAMENTO, CAL., April 4, 1884.

To the President of the United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

I am authorized to inform you that the Legislature of the State of California has passed the following senate concurrent resolution relative to the speedy passage of the Chinese restriction act now pending in Congress:

"Whereas there are now pending in the Senate of the United States and in the House of Representatives certain measures which will tend to relieve the State of California from the continued immigration of Chinese,

"Resolved, That it is the sense of the senate of the Legislature of California (the assembly concurring) that the Congress of the United States should, without unnecessary delay, pass the amended Chinese restriction bill now pending before that body.

"Be it further resolved, That the governor be requested to forward a copy of the foregoing resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress."

THOS. L. THOMPSON, Secretary of State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be laid upon the table, the bill upon the subject having been reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of citizens of New Tacoma, Wash., praying that the land grant relating to the Cascade division of the Northern Pacific Railroad may be continued and delivered upon the completion of that road to Puget Sound; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a memorial of Kearny Post, No. 48, Grand Army of the Republic, of East Wallingford, Vt., urging the adoption of the recommendations of the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the memorial of Leslie Thorn, George Hansener, and Henry Rappold, of Buffalo, N. Y., editors of The Truth, remonstrating against the passage of the news-copyright bill now before Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also presented the petition of Mrs. Anna Burrington, of Manchester, N. H., praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CONGER presented the memorial of H. N. Mather, of Saginaw, Mich., remonstrating against the passage of the bill to copyright news matter; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Grand Army of the Republic, Post No. 210, of Michigan, relative to further legislation in regard to pensioning ex-soldiers; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented resolutions of the Board of Trade of the city of Detroit, Mich., in favor of the enactment of a law suspending the coinage of silver dollars for at least two years and discontinuing the issue of all bills of less denomination than $5; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN presented resolutions adopted by the Dick Mason Post, No. 304, Grand Army of the Republic, of Lowell, Ohio, favoring the passage of certain pension laws; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FRYE presented the memorial of O. M. Moore, editor and proprietor of The Phonograph, at Phillips, Me., remonstrating against the copyright-news bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. CALL. I present the petition of P. Wise, inspector of hulls, and Daniel Fry, inspector of boilers, of Apalachicola, Fla. The petition respectfully asks Congress to increase the salaries of the United States local inspectors of steam vessels at that place to the sum of $1,200 per annum, and is accompanied by a statement of the number of vessels and the amount of inspection at that port. When the proper order is reached I shall introduce a bill which accompanies the petition. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES presented a memorial of citizens of Daviess County, Indiana, formerly soldiers in the late war of the rebellion, and a resolution adopted by Boothroyd Post, No. 31, Grand Army of the Republic, Delphi, Ind., in favor of the passage of a bill for the equalization of bounties; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the memorial of William C. Talcott and other editors, citizens of Valparaiso, Ind., and the memorial of James J. Lash, of Albion, Ind., remonstrating against the passage of the news-copyright bill; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of survivors of the Mexican war, praying for the passage of a bill granting them pensions; which was referred to to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLAIR. I present the memorial of Kendall & Ladd, of Manchester, N. H., and the memorial of John B. Clark, editor of the Manchester Era, the journal having the largest weekly circulation in New England, I think, remonstrating against the passage of the proposed news-copyright bill. I move that the memorials be referred to the Committee on the Library.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON presented a petition of citizens of Jasper County, Iowa, praying for the location of a soldiers' home in the State of Iowa; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution adopted at a meeting of the executive committee of the Civil Service Reform Association of Missouri, urging the repeal of the act of May 15, 1820, and acts supplementary thereto, by which the tenure of certain administrative offices was fixed at four years; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Davenport (Iowa) Academy of Natural Sciences, protesting against any amendment or change in the existing patent laws that will shorten the period of the existence of a patent or will in any manner obstruct the inventor's control of his invention; which were referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the L. G. Ireland Post, No. 118, Grand Army of the Republic, of Sibley, Iowa, indorsing the recommendations made by the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic for certain amendments to the pension laws; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ALLISON. I also present resolutions adopted by the Board of Trade of Burlington, Iowa, protesting against the passage of certain bills now pending in both Houses of Congress proposing certain modifications and changes in the laws relating to patents, which I ask may lie on the table.

Mr. HAWLEY. Those petitions have been coming in considerable numbers, and should be sent to the Committee on Patents instead of being left on the table.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; I ask that the memorial be referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present two resolutions adopted on the 5th of April, 1884, by members of Colonel Grover Post, No. 78, Department of Missouri, Grand Army of the Republic, at Warrensburg, Mo., indorsing the recommendations made to Congress by the committee on pensions of the national body of the Grand Army of the Republic and requesting legislative action to carry them into effect, and also recommending that General A. J. Smith be placed on the retired-list of the Army with the rank of major-general. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

SIOUX INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the Senate to take up now for consideration the bill (S. 1755) to divide a portion of the reservation of the Sioux Nation of Indians, in Dakota, into separate reservations, and to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder, of course yielding to any morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the Senate now consider the bill indicated by him. Is there objection?

Mr. CALL. I object.

Mr. DAWES. I understand there is further morning business and I withdraw my request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request is withdrawn.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CALL, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1832) for the relief of William C. Dodge, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BLAIR. I am directed by the Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the bill (S. 654) to provide for a commission on the subject of the alcoholic-liquor traffic, to report it without amendment, and to accompany the report, as a part of the report, with sundry statements made before the committee on the subject. I ask that the report be printed and that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 675) to extend the benefits of section 4 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1866," approved March 3, 1865, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1005) for the relief of the Nez Percé Indians, in the Territory of Idaho, and of the allied tribes residing upon the Grand Ronde Indian reservation, in the State of Oregon, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 463) to provide for coinage at the branch mint at Denver, Colo., reported it with an amendment.

SURETIES OF J. O. RAWLINS.

Mr. BAYARD. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance to ask that the bill (S. 329) for the relief of the sureties of the late J. O. Rawlins be recommitted to that committee, together with the report accompanying the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be entered if there be no objection.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MILLER, of California, introduced a bill (S. 2043) for the relief of Mrs. Maria L. Strong; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 2044) granting a pension to Richard Johnson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, introduced a bill (S. 2045) for the relief of the Eastern Presbyterian church, in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PUGH introduced a bill (S. 2046) for the relief of Rittenhouse Moore, of Alabama; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 2047) amending section 4414 of the Revised Statutes, fixing the compensation of inspectors of hulls and boilers in the several districts of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

SURPLUS DEPOSIT WITH THE STATES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Concurrent and other resolutions are now in order. Under the rules the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution offered yesterday by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND]. It will be read. [A pause.] The Chair understands that the indorsement on the back of the resolution is erroneous. It appears on the Journal, the Chair understands, that the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GARLAND. That was the order. At a subsequent day under the call of "concurrent and other resolutions" I shall move to take it up.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. PIKE, it was Ordered, That the papers in the claim of William Bowen be withdrawn from the files of the Senate for the use of the Committee on the District of Columbia of the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. PLATT, it was Ordered, That Stephen N. Smith have permission to withdraw from the files of the Senate original letters patent granted him in the United States and in Canada for improvement in machines for making lacing-hooks.

PAUL STROBACH.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire and report whether Paul Strobach, whose confirmation as marshal of the middle and southern judicial districts of Alabama has been rejected by the Senate, is now discharging the duties of that office, and whether he is entitled to execute the powers and duties of such office in the place of M. C. Osborne, who was suspended by order of the President in the vacation of the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that that resolution be printed and go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be printed and go over until to-morrow.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 503) to increase the endowment of the University of Alabama from the public lands in said State.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 3956) to amend section 2527 of the Revised Statutes relating to the district of Gloucester; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

CINCINNATI LAW LIBRARY.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the consent of the Senate to consider House joint resolution No. 224 at this time. It is on the Calendar, having been reported yesterday from the Committee on the Library.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the Senate consider at this time the joint resolution (H. Res. 224) granting certain publications to the Cincinnati law library. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the letter of the Secretary of the Interior be read for information, reserving the right to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, April 11, 1884.

SIR: Replying to your communication of the 10th instant, inclosing a joint resolution of the House providing that certain documents shall be supplied by the Secretary of the Interior to the Cincinnati law library, I have the honor to inform you that the only documents enumerated therein that can now be furnished by this Department are a partial set of those that are usually denominated Congressional documents, embracing the journals and executive and miscellaneous documents and the reports of the committees of the two Houses of Congress.

Of these documents the Department can furnish such as belong to the last six Congresses and a portion of certain of the preceding Congresses. The Department can also supply a partial set of the Annals of Congress. The surplus copies of the Reports of the Supreme Court remaining after the distribution directed by law is made are delivered to the Librarian of Congress, to be deposited in the Congressional Library. I have no information that the reports of the circuit and district courts of the United States are held for distribution by any Department of the Government.

The Revised Statutes and the Statutes at Large are now distributed by the honorable the Secretary of State. The Congressional Globe and RECORD have never been printed for distribution by any Department of the Government, most of the Departments being obliged to purchase from the Government Printer such as are required for their own official use. Such as are still available for distribution are in the hands of the Public Printer.

It is therefore evident that but a small portion of the documents named in the resolution can be supplied by this Department. It is suggested, in order to secure the object desired, that the resolution be amended in such way as to provide that in case the documents enumerated are not at the disposal of the Secretary of the Interior he shall be authorized to call for the same upon any Department or office of the Government from which they may be procured, or that the names of the several officers in whose charge the documents are now held be inserted in the resolution.

Very respectfully,

H. M. TELLER, Secretary.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN, United States Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. I must necessarily reserve the right to object until I hear some explanation of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will explain it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear the Senator make some explanation of it. I make this point: It reads:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to furnish and deliver to the Cincinnati law library two complete sets of the Reports of the Supreme Court of the United States, of the circuit and district courts of the United States.

Then, in addition—

Two complete sets of the Revised Statutes and Statutes at Large; a complete set of the Annals of Congress, of the Congressional Globe and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, of the Journals of the Senate and House of Representatives; and to enable him to comply with this resolution he is authorized to call upon and receive from any Department or office any of such books which can be supplied without inconvenience to the Government.

The joint resolution directs him to furnish all these books; in other words, to purchase at the expense of the United States two full sets of the Supreme Court Reports and of the reports of the circuit and district courts of the United States which have never been published by the Government for distribution, and then two sets of the Revised Statutes and of the twenty-two volumes of Statutes at Large, the price alone of which I believe is $5 apiece.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator has totally misunderstood the measure.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is the effect of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Missouri will suspend for a moment the Chair will ask if there is unanimous consent for this discussion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope now that consent will be given to take up the resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly; of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the discussion will proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator totally misunderstands the scope of the resolution as it will be construed by the Department and as it reads upon its face. It only provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall deliver to the Cincinnati law library one set of the documents named if he has them.

Mr. COCKRELL. No; I beg pardon.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me go on and finish my statement.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is the very point. In regard to the other books it does not make any such provision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio declines to be interrupted.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the legal construction. There is no provision here for the purchase of anything; there is no appropriation made for the purchase of anything. There is no pretense, either on the part of the other House which passed the resolution or the Committee on the Library which reported it or the Secretary of the Interior in construing it that he would be required to purchase these books.

The resolution was sent to the Secretary of the Interior in the usual way for any intimation of amendment that he might propose. He proposed an amendment that was adopted by the Committee on the Library and which is inserted at the close. If the Senator wishes to guard against such a construction of the resolution as that it means that he shall buy these books I have no objection to inserting the proper words, although I do not think it necessary.

Let me state to the Senate that the books of the Cincinnati law library, a public library owned largely by the lawyers of Cincinnati but open to all the courts of the county of Hamilton, the courts of the State of Ohio, and of the United States, all of which are held in the city of Cincinnati, were burned by the mob in the destruction of the courthouse. Every book was destroyed, and the lawyers are now calling for subscriptions and are gathering books together and will soon replace that library, which was said to have been the best law library in the United States. At all events it was the best one west of the mountains, and was a great monument of law learning, probably better than the law library here in the Capitol. Certainly they thought so at any rate. It was estimated to be worth $100,000. They propose now by their private contributions and in various ways to gather enough money to buy books to restore that library. It was thought that as Congress distributed a certain portion of public documents to the various Departments this law library might properly call upon Congress to contribute such books as it had in its possession which would tend to aid them in gathering together a library. The joint resolution was simply introduced for that purpose. I have no doubt that this law library had all the books which are mentioned in the joint resolution, and to the extent that Congress could give them those books from among the surplus books in the different Departments it would aid that much in the restoration of that valuable law library. That is all there is of it.

It is not expected or intended that the Department of the Interior will be called upon to purchase any book whatever, but only to receive such as are in the different Departments. At the suggestion of the Secretary of the Interior the latter clause has been inserted, so that he can call upon the different Departments and offices for such books as may be properly spared, and send them to Cincinnati. At his suggestion a provision was inserted, so as to read:

And to enable him to comply with this resolution he is authorized to call upon and receive from any Department or office any of such books as can be supplied without inconvenience to the Government.

If the Senator desires to make it clear, let it read "without cost" or "without purchase."

Mr. COCKRELL. I have an amendment which I will suggest to the Senator.

Mr. WILSON. I will suggest to the Senator from Ohio, if he will allow me, that he add to the resolution these words:

But no purchase of said books shall be made at the expense of the United States.

Mr. COCKRELL. I was just going to suggest an amendment which I think will cover it probably at a better place, which is to make the first part of the resolution read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to furnish and deliver to the Cincinnati law library, if the same can be done without inconvenience, from publications on hand belonging to the Government, and without cost to the Government, two sets, &c.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the words I have suggested be inserted in that part of the resolution, so as to apply to the whole thing.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have a letter here from Mr. Rufus King, who is president of the Law Library Association, stating that they do not expect the Government to contribute anything except such documents as may be on hand and not needed by it and which can be conveniently spared, and he puts the same construction upon the resolution. But there is no objection to the amendment in either form.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest the amendment. I think it covers the point more fully probably.

Mr. WILSON. I am not particular which form of amendment is adopted.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let my amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is not yet before the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. I think the amendment I have suggested probably effects the purpose as clearly as the other, possibly more so, by simply adding the words:

But no purchase of any of said books shall be made at the expense of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am willing to have either or both. If it is necessary I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution. I supposed it had been taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can only be taken up by unanimous consent. The Chair asked for unanimous consent, and then unanimous consent was given for debate upon the question of giving unanimous consent.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask for unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution. We can now dispose of it readily.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution referred to? The Chair hears none. It is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on the Library recommend an amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 11, after the word "Representatives," the committee report to strike out the words:

And copies of any other documents and publications made by the United States or any of the Departments.

And to insert:

And to enable him to comply with this resolution he is authorized to call upon and receive from any Department or office any of such books.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I move as an amendment to the amendment of the committee the words which I stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair finds that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa comes in in another part of the resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senate will allow the vote to be taken on this amendment. The amendment was suggested by the Secretary of the Interior, and I suppose there is no objection to it.

Mr. HOAR. The words, "Debates of Congress," should follow the words "Annals of Congress," I think, so that both publications may be included.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That comes in in another part of the resolution and does not relate to the amendment recommended by the committee. The question is on agreeing to the amendment recommended by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] moves an amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the joint resolution the following words:

But no purchase of any of said books shall be made at the expense of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to this amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] will be now reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 9, after the word "Annals," it is proposed to insert the words "and Debates;" so as to read:

A complete set of the Annals and Debates of Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to this amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. In lines 6 and 7 I move to strike out the words "of the circuit and district courts of the United States." Those reports never have been printed for distribution.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Secretary of the Interior states already that they have never been published by the Government. I have no objection to having those words stricken out, because the reports are not on hand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, striking out the words "of the circuit and district courts of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now I ask that the resolution be read as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read for information as amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to furnish and deliver to the Cincinnati law library two complete sets of the Reports of the Supreme Court of the United States; two complete sets of the Revised Statutes of the United States and Statutes at Large; a complete set of the Annals and Debates of Congress, of the Congressional Globe and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, of the Journals of the Senate and House of Representatives; and to enable him to comply with this resolution he is authorized to call upon and receive from any Department or office any of such books which can be supplied without inconvenience to the Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is still open to amendment.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. INGALLS. It seems to me that the resolution is rather inconsistent in its terms. The Secretary of the Interior is required to furnish and deliver these books to the Cincinnati law library. They are specified and the titles of them are given. He is directed to call upon those Departments that may have them for distribution to enable him to comply with this direction. It appears to me that the subsequent amendment that there shall be no cost or expense to the United States Government in carrying out the resolution does not relieve the Secretary of the Interior from the absolute direction to furnish and deliver these books that is contained in the first part of the resolution.

I suppose the intention of the Senator from Ohio is merely to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to furnish from the archives and collections of the Government such of these publications as can be spared without impairing the collections of the Government and without expense to the Treasury. If that is the case, it ought to say so. As it is now it is inconsistent. There is an absolute mandate on him in the first place to furnish and deliver these books, and the fact that there is to be no expense to the Government does not relieve him from the command of Congress which is contained in the first part of the resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest an amendment which I think will meet the objection and make it plain. I propose to insert after the word "library," in line 5, the words:

If the same can be done without inconvenience from publications on hand belonging to the Government, and without cost to the Government.

So as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to furnish and deliver to the Cincinnati law library, if the same can be done without inconvenience, &c.

I think that would make it perfectly plain and carry out the Senator's idea.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to any such amendment. This resolution was sent to the Secretary of the Interior and he did not object to the form, and only proposed one amendment. It is a resolution from the other House. I think if I had been drawing the resolution I should have made it much shorter than it is. I have no objection to adding the clause suggested by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move then the amendment which I suggested. It makes it plain and meets the objection, and does not change the intention or purpose of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri is not now in order, being a proposition to amend a different part of the resolution from the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator can offer it after the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole have been concurred in.

Mr. COCKRELL. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. If there be no objection the question will be taken on all of the amendments at once.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now I move to strike out after the word "authorized," in line 4, the words "and directed;" and after the words "to furnish" to strike out the words "and deliver;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to furnish to the Cincinnati law library.

And then to insert after the word "library" the words:

If the same can be done without inconvenience from publications on hand belonging to the Government, without cost to the Government.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose the main object in drawing that language was that the Secretary of the Interior would send these books as he could through the mails free with a frank. This might require him to deliver them here. However, we can arrange that or pay the postage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

CORRECTION OF AN ERROR.

Mr. HARRIS. I offer the following concurrent resolution:

Whereas in Senate bill 1063, entitled "A bill to amend the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," which passed the Senate on the 1st day of April, 1884, in that clause of said bill amending section 549 of said Revised Statutes by an error of the print is described as "section 459," and with such error said bill has passed the House of Representatives and been enrolled: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the figures in said act descriptive of said section of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia be changed from "459" to "549."

This is a simple transposition of figures describing a section to be repealed. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Senator from Tennessee think that the difficulty can be reached by a concurrent resolution, the bill having passed both Houses in the method prescribed by the Constitution?

Mr. HARRIS. I see no reason why it may not. The suggestion was made by the Committee on Enrolled Bills that that was the shortest and best method of remedying it, and I see no reason why it will not do. The bill has not gone to the President yet, and I suppose a concurrent resolution would enable us to change those figures and send it to the President in the form that it should have been passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Tennessee that the Chair is under the impression that such a resolution would have to pass by unanimous consent, inasmuch as it violates the rule in regard to enrolled bills, which must be signed by the presiding officers of the two Houses after they are enrolled according to the truth and then presented to the President. This of course would be a violation of the rule, inasmuch as the bill is to be changed after the signatures.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to changing it to a joint resolution, which will meet the objection, I suppose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks if the bill has not been sent to the President that a concurrent resolution directing a reenrollment of the bill, and then it being re-signed by the presiding officers of the two Houses, it would become operative, providing also that the other bill should not be presented to the President. That is only a suggestion of the Chair.

Mr. HARRIS. I am inclined to adopt the suggestion of the Chair, by reforming the resolution so as to conform to the suggestion made by the Chair. My only object is to correct the error.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection then the Senator from Tennessee can withdraw his resolution and offer it again.

in the form he desires. If there be no objection the concurrent resolution will be regarded as withdrawn.

Mr. HARRIS. Sooner than reform the resolution, I believe if there be no objection other than that which I see now I will simply change it to a joint resolution and let the resolution stand as it is.

Mr. INGALLS. That would requite the signature of the President of the United States.

Mr. HARRIS. So it would.

Mr. INGALLS. It appears to me that the difficulty can be better surmounted by asking unanimous consent to the adoption of this resolution as a concurrent resolution. Of course the practice is a very dangerous one. The assertion that this was an error in the description of a section of a statute would not change or in any way modify the danger that might result from this practice; because, after a bill has passed both Houses in the method prescribed by the Constitution, if we can change by concurrent resolution any of its terms, there is no limit to what might be accomplished by the procedure that is now proposed by the Senator from Tennessee. We might change an appropriation of a thousand dollars to a million in the same way. But I assume that by unanimous consent and the agreement that this was an error of the clerk or of description in the enrollment the difficulty might perhaps be overcome.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would suggest that it seems from the statement of the Senator from Tennessee that the error was in the original draught of the bill as printed, and the bill therefore was ordered to be engrossed with this error in it, the Senate adopting the error, and it was not any fault of the clerk. So the bill is now truly enrolled as it was ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. HARRIS. That is certainly true. I hold in my hand the original bill as it came from the Printer and as it passed, and in respect to this particular matter it reads:

That section 549 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and in lieu of said section the following is enacted:

"SEC. 459"—

And then proceeds the section as amended. The error is apparent. I read from the bill held in the hand of the Clerk at the time it was acted upon and at the time it passed.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Kansas speaks of a bill passing both branches in the manner prescribed by the Constitution. The Constitution prescribes that we shall make rules how it shall pass; and I suppose that any bill which has gone through the several forms will be presumed to have been passed according to our rules, because if it does not in point of fact conform to the printed rules it conforms to a rule in which all of us acquiesced at the time. If a bill gets through with the proper enrollment and signatures it must be assumed to have gone according to our rules; that is, either our established rules or those established rules modified by common consent. Therefore if this bill ever gets through and appears enrolled with the proper signatures, it has got through both branches and will be presumed to have got through both branches in the manner prescribed by the Constitution, the only manner being according to the rules which the Constitution permits both Houses to establish for themselves either as standing rules or rules for the time being. Hence the suggestion of the Chair that it be re-enrolled and re-signed will carry it to the end in the proper way and reach precisely what the Senator from Tennessee is seeking for; and it seems to me he will reach it in the shortest and safest way by requiring a re-enrollment.

Mr. HARRIS. I am informed by the clerks at the desk that this bill has not been signed by either the President pro tempore of the Senate or the Speaker of the House. It is a Senate bill, and is now in the possession of the Senate, having passed the House without amendment.

Mr. DAWES. But I suppose it will come here with the signature of the presiding officers of the two Houses. Is such a signature attached to a bill which has this mistake in it?

Mr. HARRIS. It has not been signed by either the President pro tempore of the Senate or the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. DAWES. Then there is no need of a re-enrollment; there is no need of anything except to direct the finishing up of this bill in the manner indicated by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HARRIS. That is exactly what my resolution proposes to do.

Mr. DAWES. Then I can not see any objection to it.

Mr. HARRIS. It proposes to transpose the figures of a section.

Mr. DAWES. Nothing is plainer than that the two Houses can direct their officers how to enroll a bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is still of opinion that the passage of this resolution requires unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I ask unanimous consent that it be at this time passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, will the Senate unanimously agree to the passage of this resolution correcting this error existing in the bill named when it was passed by the Senate? Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and the resolution is unanimously adopted.

SIOUX INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. DAWES. I now renew the motion I made some time since to take up Order of Business No. 334, being Senate bill 1755.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1755) to divide a portion of the reservation of the Sioux Nation of Indians, in Dakota, into separate reservations, and to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder.

The Secretary read the first section of the bill.

Mr. DAWES. I ask that the bill be considered by sections. There are a few amendments to be made as to changes in boundaries, and one being made it becomes necessary to change others, and I should like to offer them as the reading proceeds. I hope the Senate will permit me to offer an amendment to the first section now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to offer amendments by sections as the reading proceeds. Is there objection?

Mr. DAWES. It will take less time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and that order is adopted.

Mr. DAWES. I move to strike out, in line 11 of section 1, after the word "to," down to the word "thence," in line 15, as follows:

A point due west from the intersection of White River with the one hundred and second meridian; thence due east to said point of intersection, and down said White River to a point in longitude one hundred and one degrees and twenty minutes west.

And in place thereof to insert:

The mouth of Rapid Creek; thence in an easterly direction along the northern edge of the Bad Lands to the mouth of Black Pipe Creek on White River; thence up the Black Pipe Creek southerly to the source of its principal branch.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I move to add to the section:

Also the following tract of land situate in the State of Nebraska, namely, beginning at a point on the boundary line between the State of Nebraska and the Territory of Dakota where the range line between ranges 44 and 45 west of the sixth principal meridian in the Territory of Dakota intersects said boundary line; thence east along said boundary line five miles; thence due south five miles; thence due west ten miles; thence due north to said boundary line; thence due east along said boundary line to the place of beginning.

The amendment was agreed to.

Section 2 was read.

Mr. DAWES. In section 2 the change which has been already adopted renders another one proper, namely, striking out all the section after the word "namely," in line 5, as follows:

Beginning on the north boundary of the State of Nebraska at a point in longitude 101° and 20′ west, and running thence due north to White River; thence down said White River to a point in longitude 99° and 30′ west; thence due south to said north boundary of the State of Nebraska; and thence west on said north boundary to the place of beginning.

And in lieu thereof inserting:

Commencing in the middle channel of the Missouri River, opposite the mouth of White River; thence down the middle channel of said Missouri River to a point opposite the mouth of Platte or Pratte Creek, including, however, entirely within said reservation all islands, if any, in said river; thence due south to the forty-third parallel of latitude; thence west along said parallel of latitude to a point due south from the source of the principal branch of Black Pipe Creek; thence due north to the said source of Black Pipe Creek; thence down said creek to the White River; thence down White River to the place of beginning, in the Missouri River.

The amendment was agreed to.

Section 3 was read.

Mr. DAWES. I move to strike out the words "at low-water mark on the east bank," in line 6, and insert instead thereof "in the middle of the channel."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). The Chair will take the liberty of calling the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the usual language, "the center of the main channel of the river."

Mr. DAWES. I adopt that suggestion, "center of the main channel."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified. The question is on the amendment as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I move to strike out, in line 8, the words "east bank along said low-water mark" and insert the same words as above—"center of the main channel."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I move to insert, after the words "Grand River," in line 9, the words "including, however, entirely within said reservation all islands, if any, in said river."

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that that will not do.

Mr. DAWES. Why not?

Mr. ALLISON. One-half the islands may be nearer the east bank.

Mr. DAWES. That is true; but if an island in the river can be occupied by the whites for the purpose of putting up whisky-shops and the like, it was thought that the Interior Department had better be authorized to reserve it for these Indians.

Mr. ALLISON. I am in entire sympathy with the Senator on that question.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. In line 17 of the same section, after the words "Cannon Ball River," I move to insert "center of the main channel of the."

The amendment was agreed to.

Section 4 was read.

Mr. DAWES. The same amendments are necessary in this section. On the sixth line, after the words "beginning at a point," I move to strike out "at low-water mark on the east bank" and to insert in lieu thereof "in the center of the main channel."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. In line 9 the words "east bank" should be stricken out and the words "center of the main channel" inserted. Perhaps I ought to state to the Senate that the old treaty carried the reservation clear over and included the whole river on the east bank. It was not thought wise to have it carried there if settlements were to come up to the east bank, nor would it be wise to take it to the west bank. It was therefore deemed better for the interest of the Indians and for everybody concerned that the line should be at the center of the river.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. Then in line 10 I move to strike out "along said low-water mark" and insert "including also entirely within said reservation all islands, if any, in said river."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. In line 16 I move to insert "center of the main channel of the" before the words "Missouri River."

The amendment was agreed to.

Section 5 was read.

Mr. DAWES. I move to amend in section 5, line 9, after the word "latitude," by striking out "thence south on said parallel" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "thence on said forty-fourth degree of latitude to western boundary of township number 72, thence south on said township's western line."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. In the tenth line, after the words "Fort Lookout," I move to insert "thence."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. Before the words "Missouri River," in, line 11, I move to insert "center of the main channel of the;" and in line 12, after the word "north," to strike out "on" and insert "in the center of the main channel of the."

The amendment was agreed to.

Section 6 was read.

Mr. DAWES. I move to strike out section 7 without reading it and insert a substitute which has been agreed to by everybody I believe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment to section 7 will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out section 7 and insert in lieu thereof:

SEC. 7. Each member of the Santee Sioux tribe of Indians now occupying a reservation in the State of Nebraska shall be entitled to allotments upon said reserve in Nebraska as follows: To each head of a family one-quarter of a section; to each single person over 18 years of age one-eighth of a section; to each orphan child under 18 years of age one-eighth of a section; to each other person under 18 years of age now living one-sixteenth of a section; with title thereto and rights under the same in all other respects conforming to this act. And said Santee Sioux shall be entitled to all other benefits under this act in the same manner and with the same conditions as if they were residents upon said Sioux reservation, receiving rations at one of the agencies herein named: Provided, That all allotments heretofore made to said Santee Sioux in Nebraska are hereby ratified and confirmed, and each member of the Flandreau band of Sioux Indians is hereby authorized to take in Moody County, in said Dakota, the same allotments authorized by existing treaties and this act on any part of said reservation, and all allotments heretofore made by members of said band in said county are hereby ratified and confirmed, subject to the limitations and conditions of such treaties and this act. And said Flandreau band of Sioux Indians is in all other respects entitled to the benefits of this act the same as if receiving rations and annuities at any of the agencies aforesaid.

Mr. DAWES. The seventh section of the bill created a reservation outside of the Sioux reservation in Nebraska, and this is a substitute for it, which seems to everybody to be quite as advantageous for the Indians and much better for the settlers. It gives the Indians all they desire for allotments, and gives them all other privileges under this act in the Sioux reservation. They choose to go down into Nebraska and locate their allotments, and this is yielded to them. That is all.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read from section 8 to section 11 inclusive.

Mr. DAWES. After the tenth line, at the close of section 11, I desire to add the following:

And no tribal patent provided for by this act shall in any way interfere with or be a bar to any future grant to any railway corporation of a right of way, and necessary grounds for railroad purposes across any reservation hereby created, by any agreement made with the Indians to which such reservation is set apart, negotiated under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior and ratified according to law in all respects the same as if this act was not passed.

This bill provides for a tribal patent of this land to the tribe. It does not provide any way by which, if the tribe and the United States want subsequently to put a railroad through the land, the right of way can be acquired, and this amendment provides that, notwithstanding the tribal patent, railroad rights may be granted by Congress just the same as if this law had not passed. That is, an agreement must be made with that particular tribe and ratified by Congress. This takes the whole reservation out from under the confederation of tribes and gives each particular tribe its own reservation. The amendment provides that notwithstanding the tribal patent or deed, still a railroad company may make an agreement with a particular tribe to let the railroad go over its land, and if that is ratified by Congress it will have the same effect as if the tribal patent did not exist. That is the object of the amendment. It would otherwise bar such a right, I suppose.

The amendment was agreed to.

Sections 12 and 13 were read.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to amend section 13. The quantity of land allowed to the Poncas in the section is just twice as much as it ought to be, and therefore in the eighteenth line I move to strike out "one-half" and insert "one-quarter;" in line 19 to strike out "one-quarter" and insert "one-eighth;" in line 21 to strike out "one-quarter" and insert "one-eighth;" in line 22 to strike out "one-eighth" and insert "one-sixteenth," making the allotment just half what it is in the section as printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. I will explain that. These Poncas that are to be provided for are a remnant of that band which was forced down into the Indian Territory. The band after it got down into the Indian Territory released all its rights up here, but this portion had fled back. The Interior Department undertook to make an agreement with the Sioux Indians to give them the quantity of land which is printed in this section of the bill, but that agreement never received the sanction prescribed in the treaty. The committee in this bill proposed to provide for those Indians, and they wrote the bill providing for them the quantity of land which an effort had been made to get the Sioux to agree to; but all the Sioux and the Santees who have gone into Nebraska take into their allotments just one-half that quantity. Therefore, inasmuch as that had not been agreed to, it was thought best to conform that agreement to all the others, and at the same time compensate these Poncas by giving them the other advantages which the bill gives to all the Sioux. So the Poncas have, instead of the larger quantity of land, the smaller quantity, which is precisely what all the others take by allotment, and then they have all the advantages the Sioux have under the old treaty and under this act. So it was thought at the Interior Department and by the committee who visited the ground that the Poncas were taken better care of by this provision than they were in the original agreement.

Mr. CONGER. The Poncas have been driven from reservation to reservation, from good reservations to poor ones, and from poor ones to worse ones, and then to this reservation, for this is the fourth removal, if I recollect aright——

Mr. DAWES. This does not require any removal. They are right where they went when they came back from the Indian Territory, and this is carrying out what in point of fact they are doing. I would not countenance any removal of the Poncas, nor would I countenance anything that would not do full and ample justice to that little body of Poncas who have suffered, whether wittingly or unwittingly, at the hands of this Government very hard treatment; but here they get, instead of three hundred and twenty acres each to the head of a family, just one-half that, one-fourth of a section, one-hundred and sixty acres of land in severalty and in fee-right where they claim that they always were entitled to stay, and they get in addition to that the educational privileges of the old Sioux treaty, which they do not otherwise get, which they have no share or lot in, and they get the annuities and the rations that the Sioux get. They are not entitled to those under any circumstances. It was thought by their friends that it was better for them to take one-hundred and sixty acres each in fee, and take these educational privileges and these annuities, than for us to give them a larger quantity of land than any other Indians in that vicinity, and at the same time not permit them to have the annuities and other privileges that their neighbors have. It was making a distinction which they could not understand, and it would be better for them to take this method.

Mr. CONGER. This little remnant of a band who had vast territory in their hands in the early history of this country and from different causes have been reduced to a remnant are perhaps as intelligent a body of Indians as there are left in our country. They have been persecuted shamefully both by the Government and by agents and in all possible ways. Their history repeated to our children one hundred years hence, if written out, would be a perpetual disgrace, as many other cases of bad management of the Indians would be to our civilization and our time.

Somebody in preparing this bill prepared it with reference to what seemed to be the idea of some justice and some fairness to this quite intelligent and bright tribe of Indians, and I venture to say that somebody who wanted some of these lands and the better portion of them has told this committee that the Indians would be better off if they had less land, and I notice in all these treaties, if they are before Congress for a time, there are people who continually attempt to diminish the amount of land that is given to the Indians, until it is a very common feeling with many that 6 feet by 3 is all that is necessary to leave to an Indian, and a proportionally smaller amount for his minor children, on the theory that the dead Indian is the good Indian——

Mr. DAWES. I call the attention of the Senator——

Mr. CONGER. One moment. I say the theory seems to be that the dead Indian is the good Indian, and in that condition of goodness is entitled to 6 feet by 3 of the land over which he roamed once as chief and owner.

Now, sir, I am a good deal surprised at the reasons given for this diminution, cutting down all at once what seems to have been prepared in this bill with great care as to the amount of lands allowed to these Indians. There is no provision for further subdivision; there is no provision in this bill for lands in common, not that can be owned in individual right. There are some lands in common. I do not know exactly the position where these Poncas are, whether they are in what is called the Omaha reservation just below Sioux City on the Nebraska side——

Mr. DAWES. I think if the Senator understands just what is provided for these Poncas he will see that they are taken better care of than they would be if they had the agreement which they failed to get from the Sioux Indians carried out. They are on the Sioux reservation in Dakota—98,000 acres. It was theirs to begin with, not belonging to these particular Indians but to the tribe, and it was without any reference to them run around by the boundaries of the old great Sioux reservation in Dakota, and they were driven out of it. This band of one hundred and eighty-four ran away from the Indian Territory and came back to this reservation and are on this land in Dakota; they have no rights under the Sioux treaty, and an effort has been made to get the Sioux to give them land enough for these one hundred and eighty-four Poncas. Mr. Kirkwood and the friends of these Poncas negotiated an agreement by which the Sioux chiefs agreed to let them have this larger quantity, but the treaty required the ratification of that agreement by the tribes at home. When it got back to the tribes at home they said that the larger quantity was greater than any individual Indian of their own tribe was entitled to under their treaty, and that they would agree to one hundred and sixty acres, but that they would not agree to three hundred and twenty, for that was just double what under their own treaty their own Indians were allowed, and therefore it could not be ratified.

Now this agreement sets them up in the Dakota reservation on just as much as the Dakota Indians have, and it gives them in common with the Dakota Indians all the rest of the land in common, makes them a part of the tribes so far as beneficiaries are concerned, gives them all the lands in common along with the others, and gives them the annuities and gives them the schooling provisions of the treaty, and gives them what in this act is contained, an extension of those school privileges for twenty years. That is the real fact.

I sympathize with all that the Senator from Michigan says about these Indians. I have spread myself upon the record till the Senate has become tired of it, probably, in vindication of the rights of these Poncas; and the committee that went out there and visited the ground were all in sympathy with what the Senator says. The committee are agreed that on the whole these amendments as I have suggested them put these Poncas in a much better position than they would be if they had their original agreement. I hope the Senator will see it in that light, because I do not want to have a controversy with him on that point. I do not want him to think for a moment that anybody has forgotten the original outrage upon these Ponca Indians. The committee have put these Ponca Indians on a better footing than they were ever put before.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, I was about to say that I do not wish any disagreement with the Senator from Massachusetts, because in the main since he has had the control of Indian matters in the Senate I have been very much pleased with the humanity and the fairness and the disposition to protect even against prejudice the remaining tribes of Indians that are scattered through the West which have marked his action. I give him all credit for the fact that on many occasions he has been zealous to go further than his fellows in the Senate to protect the rights of Indians and explain their rights. And yet there is a little too much Yankee trading in this to suit me. I say it without disparagement or prejudice.

What does this bill mean? It was drawn to give some benefit to these poor Poncas, these intelligent Poncas. They knew enough to run away from the Indian Territory and get back into the climate and latitude and region where they and their fathers had lived for centuries. They could not be made slaves and shackled down there in that insalubrious climate (insalubrious to them), and against the whole Government and against all its officers they ran away from the Indian Territory in squads, a family by itself, individuals by themselves, and some together, and they worked their way back to their old home.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, which is Senate bill 1372.

Mr. CONGER. I ask permission of the Senate to say a word or two more.

Mr. HOAR. As representing the bankruptcy bill as far as any one Senator does I will make no objection if the Senate pleases to let it be laid aside informally by unanimous consent and let this Indian bill be finished. If it shall turn out that the bill leads to a protracted discussion, I shall reserve the right to call up the unfinished business.

Mr. FRYE. I want the Senator from Massachusetts to remember that I am behind him with an important bill and that I yielded very gracefully.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the Senator will not object. I think after we have disposed of this point there will be nothing in the bill that will cause any debate.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose five or ten minutes will conclude the bill.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It will probably occupy a little more than five or ten minutes, but the time will be brief.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, not to lose its place, in order that the bill taken up on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] may be proceeded with. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CONGER. It is necessary that I should say a word more, because I had cast a little reflection on that portion of our beloved land represented by the Senator from Massachusetts in saying that this was a Yankee trick. What does this mean? It means that after the bill drawn up by those who thought they were doing justice to this tribe by giving them a certain amount of land, those of my own race and people who are anxious to secure the best land everywhere—they have got the best land in the world, but they want the best of the best always—have induced this committee to cut off half the Ponca lands, and how? By agreeing to give them the money that belongs to the Sioux tribe, to be expended for education and for other things, to make them participators in the property and rights and benefits of the Sioux tribe, which we have secured to them by treaty, to pay for lands we give to our own brethren the whites. That is the way it is. Can not Congress give them the full quota of these lands, and also give them these privileges which are spoken of?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. What I desire to say is that the poor Poncas have no lands. All of those that we propose to give them we give them with the assent of the owners of those lands, to wit, the great Sioux Nation. We proposed at first, it is true, to give three hundred and twenty acres to each head of a family; but it was subject to the assent of the Sioux, and the Sioux have not yielded their consent to it.

Mr. CONGER. Talk about consent and about treaties with Indians! When did the Poncas consent to relinquish their first reservation, and when their second, and when their third, and when did they leave and run away from the fourth reservation which this Government had given them in the Indian Territory? Talk about consent and about rights! The Poncas once had the best lands in the United States; they were a powerful nation; they were a people intelligent and bright, and they have been driven from place to place till they are destroyed and worn out, and now we tell them that the reservation we first got away from them they can not have, and the second and the third they can not have, and they have gone away from the fourth, and now we tell them they have no land, and we will give them a little. A succession of infamous wrongs to that people brings us to the point where we can say to them boldly that they have no land, and that if we give them anything it is a free gift.

I think, notwithstanding the demand for these lands from all peoples of the earth that we are trying to save for those of native birth and of foreign birth, we might give the natives of the soil in a grazing country not well suited for agriculture, depending on irrigation, at least a little place to pasture their cows and nurture their ponies.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to section 13 proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The question being put, it was declared that the ayes appeared to prevail.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the yeas and nays. ["No!" "No!"] Let us divide. If you have not got a quorum, give the land.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A division is demanded.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 16, no 1; no quorum voting.

Mr. CONGER. With a minority of the Senate present there is no doubt of the verdict of sixteen. I do not think it is well for sixteen Senators to take away all the rights of the Poncas or half of them.

Mr. PLATT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The statement of the Senator from Michigan is a very extraordinary one. We take away none of the rights of the Poncas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the call for the yeas and nays seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PIKE. I wish to have the amendment reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. DAWES. If I may have unanimous consent for this bill to be taken up to-morrow morning and finished I shall not interfere further with the regular order and will stop now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is unable to see how anything can be done without a quorum present, it having appeared that no quorum has voted.

Mr. DAWES. That is so.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Let there be a call of the Senate; that will determine whether there is a quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the best way will be to have the yeas and nays taken on the amendment.

Mr. DAWES. Before the yeas and nays are taken, let me say that these fugitive Poncas are without homes and without a foot of land. The tribe itself was forced down into the Indian Territory, and when they got down there they sold out their rights to the Government. These people would not stay there. They were wronged from beginning to end. It was a bold theft. But these people have no homes. They came up to this Dakota reservation, and we make this provision for them. Because we do not make it just as large again as we do for any other Indians, and because we undertook in the beginning to make it as large again and failed, the Senator from Michigan is afraid we are ruining these Poncas!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment, upon which the yeas nays have been ordered.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. HAMPTON. I beg to announce that my colleague [Mr. BUTLER] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON].

Mr. ALLISON. My colleague [Mr. WILSON] is paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON].

YEAS—40.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I merely rise to say that I understand it was announced by my colleague [Mr. ALLISON] that I was paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON]. That pair was transferred to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER], and that will account for my voting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The RECORD will show the fact.

Mr. DAWES. I do not feel at liberty to ask the indulgence of interfering further with the regular order, but I want to say to the Senate that this opens to actual settlers ten million acres of land. There is an immense pressure everywhere, especially in Dakota, to get this bill through, and unless it can go to the other branch very early there will be no hope of its getting through under a year. I will ask the Senate if they will not permit me to have it finished to-morrow morning. I think there will be no opposition if the President will ask the consent of the Senate that it may be taken up to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the bill under consideration be taken up to-morrow morning immediately after the conclusion of the morning business. Is there objection?

Mr. FRYE. Did the Chair state the request of the Senator from Massachusetts correctly?

Mr. DAWES. Immediately after the morning business.

Mr. FRYE. I understood that he asked that we might take it up and finish it to-morrow.

Mr. DAWES. I do not intend to trench upon the regular orders.

Mr. FRYE. All right; then I shall not object.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator from Massachusetts mean to-morrow morning during the morning hour?

Mr. DAWES. After the morning business, within the morning hour.

Mr. HARRIS. To the exclusion of the Calendar under the eighth rule?

Mr. DAWES. Yes; I thought the Senate would indulge us to that extent under the statement which I have made as to the special importance of this bill. I hope the Senate will allow us that indulgence.

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the emergency as stated by the Senator from Massachusetts; but I give notice that so far as I have the power I shall insist upon going to the Calendar after the morning business up to 2 o'clock daily hereafter.

Mr. DAWES. Will not the Senator let us finish this bill?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield on the present occasion to the appeal of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposed unanimous consent asked for by the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none. Therefore to-morrow, after the morning business, this bill will be further considered by unanimous consent.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 450) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a ponton bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the city of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa;" in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. FARLEY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6092) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1372) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], in line 3, section 31, to strike out "five" and insert "two;" so as to read:

That any person residing within the jurisdiction of the United States, owing debts provable under this act exceeding the amount of $200, may apply, by petition.

Mr. HOAR. I wish the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] would move his amendment to make the amount $300 and I will consent to it.

Mr. GARLAND. I move to strike out "two" and insert "three,"

Mr. GEORGE. That does not dispose of my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that it is proposed, as an amendment to the amendment, to strike out "two" and insert "three." The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment as amended, to strike out "five" and insert "three;" so as to make the amount $300.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COKE. I now propose the amendment adverted to yesterday to section 9. I move to strike out that section and insert the following in lieu thereof:

SEC. 9. That any debt, demand, or property claimed by the trustees shall be sued for in such court, either State or Federal, as the bankrupt would have been entitled to resort to in enforcing the same claim: Provided, That the court of bankruptcy may in any case where the jurisdiction of the State and Federal courts is concurrent direct that the suit shall be brought in the State court.

Mr. HOAR. There is no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill and read sections 32 and 33.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to move a mere verbal amendment in line 2 of section 33, after the word "debts," to insert "as aforesaid." I move that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question before I offer some amendments. I desire to call his attention to the first part of section 33. The section commences—

That any person being a trader, residing and owning, &c.,

I desire to know whether he construes the bill as if those words "being a trader" were inserted in each one of the following clauses separated by a semicolon?

Mr. HOAR. I do, very clearly; they run through the entire section as I understand.

Mr. GEORGE. I offer the following amendment to line 18 of the section: After the word "creditor" I move to insert "who is also a trader," so that the provision will be that any preference made by a trader to any other creditor, except one who is a trader himself, shall not be a cause of involuntary bankruptcy. That is the idea.

Mr. HOAR. So that anybody may prefer his wife, or brother, or sister, or daughter?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir; prefer any honest creditor that he has.

Mr. FRYE. Is not a trader an honest creditor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi moves to amend by inserting after the word "creditor," in line 18, the words "who is also a trader."

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the right of a debtor in failing circumstances to make a preference of one creditor over another is as old as the common law itself, recognized in England as well as in this country. It has never been denied, except where some proceedings like these have been instituted. The author of this bill has so far yielded to the idea that compulsory proceedings ought not to extend to the community generally that he has confined them to proceedings against persons who are traders—a very proper limitation. I think it would be entirely consistent with that idea to confine these involuntary proceedings to transactions between traders themselves, and for reasons which I will now state.

In a large portion of this country, in the rural districts, the country merchant, who is a trader in the absence of banks, is the depositary to a very large extent of the cash of the farmers in the community who have extra money. He is also very frequently the debtor of these farmers in the way of purchasing their crops. The money which is thus deposited with him and the proceeds of the crops thus bought go into his business. They are used in liquidating his debts which he owes to other creditors; they go to swell his assets. But the time comes in the history of a great many of these country merchants when they are embarrassed, when they are in failing circumstances. Now, under this section as it stands he would not be permitted to pay back any of these funds or to pay any of these debts, although these debts and these deposits were created for the benefit of his business and actually went into his business and swelled his assets for distribution among his creditors.

Mr. President, there is something in the idea that when traders have contributed each one his share to the general fund of the bankrupt trader, when each has sold him goods, then when there is a failure there should be a distribution pro rata among these contributors; but that does not apply, I submit with great respect, to those who are not engaged in trade, who are the mere creditors of this party for accommodation, who frequently lift him out of trouble that he has got into in reference to his trading business.

Then again these persons do not stand—and I desire to call the attention of the Senate to that—on equal terms with the other creditors in ascertaining the solvency of the country merchant. We know as part of the commercial history of this country that the standing, the responsibility, the credit of every trader in this land is the subject-matter of a report made to commercial agencies in the large cities. These reports are made for circulation among traders, among factors, among merchants who are dealing with these parties. They find out at the very first instant when there is danger and protect themselves, while the farmers or persons residing in the neighborhood have no access to these reports; they only look at the party as he appears in business at home; and they regard him as solvent as long as there is no judicial process interfering with his business or until he voluntarily makes an assignment for the benefit of his creditors. That is the way this is done; we all understand it; and the result is that while traders having access to these commercial reports are fully posted as to the condition of any trader or merchant in the country, they can see at a long distance whether it is proper to refuse credit to him or to extend credit to him, when his neighbors, frequently deceived by the credit which he has obtained in the large cities from the wholesale merchants, filling his shelves with goods, and everything seems to go on prosperously, know nothing of the rottenness which the others may know. So I say it would be unjust, that it would be unfair to this class of creditors to make a preference paid to them an act of bankruptcy on the part of the trader or country merchant.

Then again, Mr. President, as the section now stands he is prohibited from making a preference to anybody whatever. If he pays his washerwoman he has committed an act of bankruptcy, and his washerwoman may be compelled to return the money. If he pays his butcher's bill, if he pays any family expense which has been incurred upon a credit, he commits an act of bankruptcy, and these parties become the recipients of a prohibited and unlawful thing.

I think it is just and right when we confine these involuntary proceedings to traders alone that we should take the next logical step and confine acts of involuntary bankruptcy to acts between traders alone, and in that view I insist on the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, of course this amendment is a destruction of the bill. I do not suppose there are ten persons in this country who would be in favor of a bankruptcy bill with the proposition of the Senator from Mississippi in it. I suppose that the rate of interest in the Senator's State of Mississippi is probably about 10 per cent., the average rate of interest which people pay for loans of any considerable permanence where the credit of the debtor is perfectly good or even upon mortgage security. I do not know how that is; the Senator will correct me if I have it too high, but I suppose it is about that. The Government of the United States borrows money at a little less than 3 per cent. on long loans to-day. The price of a Government bond indicates a rate of interest a little less than 3 per cent. The rate of interest for money on call loans in the large and small commercial and manufacturing cities where there are banks ranges from 3 to 4 or 5 per cent., fluctuating a little.

A man went up from Boston this last summer into one of the cities in the interior of Massachusetts with several hundred thousand dollars to loan and applied to the debtors there who were borrowing money at 5 per cent. to take the capital which he represented—he was the agent of capitalists—at 4 per cent., to which the debtors replied that the advantage of borrowing money at their own savings-banks and in their own neighborhoods was that if there came a hard time the savings-banks would not press them suddenly to pay, while his clients, who were strangers, might. Thereupon he gave them a stipulation that the debtor might make the payment at any time or in any sum he chose, and the creditor should not be at liberty on his part to call for the debt in less than ten years; and on that bargain he loaned out a number of hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Now, what is the difference? Why is it that the debtor State of Mississippi pays 10 per cent. for all the money it borrows and creditors in Wall street, New York, or in State street, Boston, will loan money close at home at 3 per cent. to the Government or at 4 under these circumstances so advantageous to the debtor? There is but one explanation of the thing. The telegraph brings for all purposes of business connection these two communities within ten minutes of one another; the laws of the United States are the same, sending their rain on the evil and the good alike, from Maine to San Francisco. It is simply the prevalence of a spirit like that which is indicated by the amendment proposed by my honorable friend from Mississippi that there are certain persons—I will not say it is the opinion of the entire community—who do not mean that bargains made by debtors and creditors shall be fairly and justly kept by the debtor, that there is not to be fair play.

Why, sir, just let it be believed that under the laws of the United States the creditor is put under the most absolute restraint against injustice, tyranny, or oppression; but when that restraint is accomplished, if the debtor fails, that portion of his property which ought not to be reserved on liberal exemption to himself or his family shall be divided justly, man for man, without distinction of party, and this great accumulation of pent-up capital would rush from the North like a wave, fertilizing, enriching, benefiting, and stimulating those communities.

Now, sir, the Senator from Mississippi proposes that if a trader anywhere fails, having distant creditors, the law of the United States shall permit that trader to postpone to the last those distant creditors and to take the property, out of which he can pay 60, 70, 80, or 90 per cent., and give it to his sisters, or mother, or wife, or children, or cousins, or aunts, or his neighbors. It does not seem to me that that is just or that it is expedient for the traders or the people of Mississippi. The incorporation of that amendment in this bankruptcy bill, if it pass, I believe—I express my opinion—would cost that people millions upon millions of dollars, if the bill was in force ten years, in keeping up the rate of interest.

These men expect to buy goods of manufacturers and traders at a distance; they expect to borrow capital of the capitalists; that is their necessity if they are to trade and live and be a commercial community in any degree, and they will pay for it. The creditor class is not the loser by inequality or by injustice on the part of the debtor, and of the creditor class the sharp tyrant least of all is the loser. It is the debtor whose interest it is to secure absolute equality in payment; it is the debtor community, it is the debtor State, it is the debtor neighborhood, and not the creditor, whose interest is at the foundation of this bill and the scheme upon which it is framed.

I say again, as the result of much meditation, study, and inquiry upon this special matter for many years, and especially of late years, that you have to have just the one belief spread where capital extends that the debtors, wherever in this country they are found, will pay their debts proportionally if they can not pay them in full, justly, man for man, without exception or discrimination, and the pent-up accumulation of capital will run over this country like a Mississippi flood.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the Senator's argument does not hold good when tested either by reason or by the experience of this country and England. In the first place we have had a bankrupt law in this country which contained the very provision which I am seeking to change by the amendment I have offered, and I did not see during the existence of that bankrupt law (and it extended over a great many years) any very great desire on the part of capitalists to make investments more than they did before or than they have shown since. We have no bankrupt law now. By the law of every State in the Union, I believe, certainly by the common law of England, every man who possesses property and is indebted has a right, although he be in failing circumstances, to dispose of that property fairly and impartially to any one of his creditors or more to the exclusion of all others. And yet while this is the law now all over this country, all over the South, we see, contrary to the Senator's statement——

Mr. JONAS. Will the Senator allow me to say that is not the law of Louisiana. It prohibits preference.

Mr. GEORGE. I was speaking of States in which the common law prevailed. I say, sir, notwithstanding this, we see capital going into the Southern section of the country at an unprecedented rate. There is nothing in that argument.

Then in England this has been the law from the earliest period of the common law, and yet there has been no more prosperous country than England. But the Senator misstates the object of my amendment entirely when he says that under it a man may give his property to his wife, or his child, or his relative. That is not the purpose and meaning of my amendment. He will be compelled to pay to a bona fide creditor, and he must do it under the strict limitations of the common law governing preferences of this sort. Although the law tolerates and approves the right of the owner of property to make such disposition of it in payment of his debts as he sees proper, yet when he does make a preference the law looks at it with jealousy and scrutinizes it with a view to see whether there was any intent in making the payment to secure a benefit to himself or commit a fraud on others.

But, Mr. President, I insist that although there may be some inconvenience, as there will be from any rule of law that may be adopted on this subject, arising from the rule as I say it ought to be, it is still a just provision; it is right; it is in accordance with the law which we and our forefathers have been accustomed to from the beginning down to the present time.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Mississippi whether if a man goes to New Orleans from his neighborhood and purchases a stock of goods and goes home he would favor the right of that person to distribute the stock of goods among the neighbors and let the New Orleans merchant go without his pay?

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator has no right to ask me any such question from anything that has occurred or from the force of the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that to be the force of the amendment exactly.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not propose to do any such thing by the amendment. I only propose that when a trader whom the New Orleans merchant has set up as a man of capital and credit goes into the country and borrows money and takes it to New Orleans and pays his debts there with part of it, and when the pinch comes and the merchant in New Orleans knows from the reports of the commercial agencies his condition and the country people know nothing of it, I only propose that they shall have a fair showing to get their money. That is my statement of the case, and it has truth and justice in it.

The way this bill stands now any manufacturing company, any merchant in embarrassed circumstances who owes his laborers, owes his clerks, owes his porters, owes the men who do the drudgery of his business, can not pay them one dollar without committing an act of bankruptcy. That is the way the bill stands. He is absolutely bound to make a division among all his creditors pro rata. I make this statement, although there is a provision in the bill that after a party has been declared a bankrupt and when the bankrupt court comes to divide the assets these servants and clerks may be paid not exceeding $100 for labor during the preceding six months; but while that rule obtains under this bill as to a division of the assets after the party has been declared a bankrupt, yet the trader cannot make that payment before he goes into bankruptcy without committing an act of bankruptcy.

Mr. CAMERON of Wisconsin. That is a very important statement, and I would inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts whether that is the construction which he puts upon this bill?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly not. It is not a preference in violation of this bill to pay a person whom the law says may be paid in full.

Mr. GEORGE. The language of the bill is—

> Or who, being insolvent, makes a preference to any creditor as hereinafter defined, or makes an assignment for the benefit of existing creditors, with or without preferences.

That is the way the language of the bill is, and you will not find anything in this bill about paying, by the trader, clerks and laborers a sum not exceeding $100.

Mr. HOAR. How is that a preference? The Senator is now criticising language simply. We do not differ on what the effect of the bill ought to be. How is it making a preference to a "creditor as hereinafter defined" to give a portion of the estate to a person who is entitled to it? That is not a preference. That is giving the man his right.

Mr. GEORGE. This is a very curious bill. The very extract I have read shows the Senator from Massachusetts that debtors are not permitted to do what the assignees are permitted to do, for in it we have this extraordinary provision:

> Or makes an assignment for the benefit of existing creditors, with or without preferences.

After the bankruptcy, as I understand, except a few special cases excepted from the operation of the act——

Mr. HOAR. If I may be permitted again to interrupt my friend from Mississippi——

Mr. GEORGE. Of course.

Mr. HOAR. I have too much respect for his legal judgment to suppose that he does not understand what has been a common phrase in bankruptcy legislation for centuries, I have no doubt. What this bill prohibits is the man's undertaking to put his property beyond the reach of the law. If a debtor conveys to his brother or his lawyer or to some irresponsible person his property, to any person whom the law does not authorize to receive and divide it among the creditors in their behalf, the bill says that shall be an act of bankruptcy entitling the law to take it from him and distribute it itself, whether there is contained in that conveyance the principle of equally dividing it or whether there is contained in that conveyance the principle of dividing it so as to have preferred creditors. That is no more than the supreme court of Massachusetts has held—the decisions vary in the country—is a fraud at common law. That is the law, providing that if a man fails his property shall be attached and taken on execution by any creditor. In the absence of any bankrupt law a man who undertakes to put that property out of his own control, where it can not be seized in the mode the law provides, commits a fraud on the legal proceeding, and you may by attachment or seizure on execution set aside that act. This provision in the bill only applies that to the bankrupt law.

Mr. GEORGE. In answer to that I would say that if the creditors get the assets of the party equally it does not make any difference whether it comes through a general assignment to them or whether it comes through the bankrupt law.

Mr. HOAR. But if the Senator will pardon me once more, it makes a good deal of difference there. It makes no difference, it is true, if a man gets his pay how he gets it, but it makes a great deal of difference whether the property of a bankrupt may be put by him into the hands of a person whom the law can not reach, who does not give a bond, who is not subject to constant supervision of the court, whom the creditors can not interrogate or deal with, because it is barely possible that when a man has made such an assignment to such an assignee the creditors will not get the property. Now, what this bill says is not that after the creditors have got it it shall be taken from them if they have not got it in the way the law provides, but the debtor shall not substitute a bankrupt law of his own for the bankrupt law of the country.

Mr. GEORGE. I know the Senator from Massachusetts is not so ignorant of the law as his speech would seem to indicate. The trustees appointed under any assignment are subject and liable to the jurisdiction of the court of chancery from the very moment they enter on their trust. If there is even the slightest deflection from the execution of the trust a court of chancery will remove them, appoint another trustee, and require him to administer the trust estate according to law and according to the terms of the assignment.

I do not want at this stage of the argument to be turned into an argument of that question. I intend to make a motion to strike out "without preferences" when we get to it. I have merely alluded to it to show that the Senator was mistaken in his construction of the bill in asserting that what the law permitted to be done after the adjudication in bankruptcy is permitted to be done before proceedings of that sort are commenced, and I mentioned that to show that he was mistaken in that; that if the bankrupt did the exact thing which was the object of the proceeding to secure, namely, make a fair and equal distribution of his property among his creditors, that in itself was an act of bankruptcy.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, in the first section of the bill there is a definition of what is termed "a trader," and then, in line 34 and from that on to the end of the section, is defined what shall not be a trader. It says the term "trader"— > shall not include persons who buy goods and merchandise for sale only to their tenants, employés, and laborers, nor who buy to sell again any goods or chattels from such tenants, employés, and laborers, &c.

It is plainly to be seen from that definition which we start with in the bill that the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi, if adopted, will defeat in the beginning the whole purpose of the bankrupt bill. It leaves the door open to a fraudulent transaction on the part of a debtor with an innumerable class of people, and you permit him to do then indirectly what the bankrupt bill says he shall not do directly.

If the Senator from Mississippi will look for a moment he will see that this debtor would necessarily be compelled to owe at least two of the class of persons who are not traders. If he owed two and preferred one, certainly injustice would be done to the other, as great an injustice would be done as if he came within the meaning of the word "trader" as defined by the first part of the bill.

The whole theory of the bill on that point is that when a trader becomes insolvent, as the term is expressed here, he can not make any preference, because from the time he becomes insolvent in theory the bankrupt act takes possession of his estate. It may be some time after that before proceedings are filed, but when they are filed they relate back to the commission of the act of bankruptcy, whether it was the actual occurrence of insolvency or any act of bankruptcy committed.

Now I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to the concluding part of this section 33, the proviso commencing in line 49. My judgment is that that proviso will go a long way to remedy the evils he complains of in the remarks he has submitted to the Senate, and that proviso has reconciled me to this feature of the bill. I preferred originally what was called the creditor's bill, as reported by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] at the last session of Congress; but with the discretion given by the proviso commencing on line 49 to the courts to compute the value of the assets of the debtor as compared with his debts and to permit him to go on for a period not exceeding ninety days and see if he can meet his obligations I am satisfied. That provision incorporated in this proviso has reconciled me to the bill, and I think it will go a long way to meet some of the difficulties suggested by the Senator from Mississippi and the difficulties that necessarily arise in an agricultural country such as he and I represent where the people have stated times of the year to sell their crops and receive their money, and do not do, as they do in other places and in other cities, business by the month. They have their annual receipts, if you please, for their crops, and upon those they do their work and carry on their affairs and business.

When the bankrupt act of 1867 first came out the question as to what was insolvency under it was tested in a case brought from the State of Arkansas. It looked to me then as it looks now, that to put a man into bankruptcy who owed $30,000 and had $50,000 of available assets, if you gave him time to operate upon, almost amounted to cruelty. But yet the Supreme Court held in the case of Toof vs. Martin (13 Wallace) that it mattered not how much assets he had, if he failed to pay his commercial paper in the regular course of business after fourteen days and the payment was suspended for that length of time he was insolvent, although he might have had upon his shelf three times the amount of estimated property at least over and above the debt that he was sued for or the debt that he failed to pay.

This proviso goes, I say, a great way to remedy that and to leave these agricultural people some period of time in which to make their arrangements, and so of the merchants who trade in that country and trade upon the capital and credit of those people. It leaves them a proper opportunity to see if they can not under the order of suspension of the court carry on their business and after a while successfully meet their debts.

I think if the Senator from Mississippi will examine it closely he will see that it removes to a great extent some of the troubles that we had formerly and at which he has hinted in his remarks; but I think his amendment breaks down the theory of the bill and opens too wide a door for the frauds that the bill is intended to remedy and to cover in its execution.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I feel a great deal of interest in the amendment which I have offered. I think probably its adoption will be the test as to whether I shall be able to vote for the bill, and therefore I hope I will be excused for pressing on the consideration of the Senate the views which I entertain in support of it.

In the first place, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that preferences, which are so much denounced by the Senator from Massachusetts and which incur also the censure of the Senator from Arkansas, are allowed in this bill to everybody except traders. Every farmer, every lawyer, every doctor, every man who is not within the definition of a trader may make his preferences just as he did before the passage of this measure. How is it, therefore, that when this right of preference, recognized by the common law from the very beginning down to this time, and recognized also in this bill as to everybody else except traders, when confined to them alone is to be such a source of fraud in the community? As I said before, a preference does not mean a fraudulent gift; it does not mean a fraudulent assignment. It means a fair and bona fide payment or security given, and unless it be such it can be set aside.

As to the position taken by the Senator from Arkansas in regard to the proviso in section 49, with due deference to him I must state that it does not remove, it does not even touch, so far as I can see, the objections which I urged against the bill. The whole scope of that proviso is simply that where a trader has been put into bankruptcy, if it appears to the court that he is nevertheless good and solvent, the court may allow him ninety days in which to prove that fact, although he may have committed some default in the payment of his commercial paper. That is the whole extent of it. It does not allow him during that time to make any payment to anybody which will operate as a preference.

So, calling the attention of the Senate again (for I wish to press that upon their attention) that the doctrine of preferences is not discountenanced by the bill but recognized in everybody except traders, the object of my amendment is the logical sequence of the position in the bill. It does not destroy its theory; it makes it harmonious and consistent to confine these preferences alone to transactions between traders. A trader alone is made guilty of an act of bankruptcy for making a preference, and I want it to be enacted (and I think that is the logical result of that position) that the preference alone shall be to a trader to have that effect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SLATER. In line 29 of section 33 I move to strike out "six" and insert "three;" so as to make the clause read:

Provided, Such petition is brought within three months after the act of bankruptcy has been committed.

I think that six months is too long a time to be allowed for an act of bankruptcy to run before any advantage is taken of it. Under the old law, if my memory serves correctly, it was four months. I am not sure about it. It ought not to be more than four months, and I think it ought not to be more than three months.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER].

Mr. HOAR. I hope that will not be adopted. Six months is the old time, if I am not mistaken in my memory.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Six months was the time.

Mr. SLATER. The old law, I understand, was four months. I know in my State of several hardships that were occasioned by the length of time. Three months is long enough.

Mr. HOAR. We are legislating for a people whose commercial transactions extend over very great distances. A manufacturer in Philadelphia sends his product to a merchant in San Francisco or in Oregon, and it is quite difficult very often for a creditor to learn the preferences of a debtor, which are very often secret. Does the Senator find that four months was the time under the old law?

Mr. SLATER. It was six months. I see.

Mr. HOAR. That was my recollection, but I was not confident enough to affirm it positively.

It seems to me that three months would in many cases enable these preferences to go undiscovered. The bill, as the Senator will observe, as in a case of fraudulent concealment under the statute of limitations and similar provisions which are familiar to every lawyer in the Senate, does not make the discovery of the preference nor the concealment of the preference a fact of any importance. It depends on the actual fact, and the limitation begins to run from the fact. It seems to me it would be very unjust to shorten the time by one-half when we consider that the transactions in this country which grow out of the sales of manufactured articles are between persons dwelling thousands of miles apart.

Of course the benefits of the bill, as far as it is a benefit to creditors, applies equally to foreign creditors, to English creditors, to German manufacturers, and to secure some reasonable chance for an equal division of the debtor's estate six months seems certainly a sufficiently brief period. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. SLATER. I will modify the amendment, and make it four months instead of three.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be modified accordingly.

Mr. SLATER. The whole trouble and difficulty between the advocates and opponents of a general system of bankruptcy is between the commercial centers and the rural sections of the country. The rural sections of the country do their business on an entirely different plan from that on which business is done in the commercial centers. By the present system of doing business in the commercial centers there is the means of ascertaining the situation of traders in different parts of the country, and they have under a bankruptcy system like this a constant percentage of advantage, while its operation and practical administration amounts in many instances to a complete crushing out of the rural interests. It is to that point that I would direct attention, and to save the rural interests from being overslaughed while giving what is just and proper to the commercial centers. Those doing business in New York and the other great cities of the country ought to have some means whereby to protect themselves, but in giving that protection to them we should be careful not to give them so large a percentage of advantage.

Mr. HOAR. I merely wish to observe that the Senator's last statement is largely met by the consideration that the bill differs from that introduced last year and also from the bankruptcy act of 1867 when it was in force, the bill not applying to anybody but traders, so that in all the rural communities nobody but a trader will be affected by it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I observe that the time fixed by the act of 1867 was six months.

Mr. SLATER. Yes, I learned that afterwards.

Mr. ALDRICH. I never heard of any complaint from any quarter as to the length of time.

Mr. SLATER. I will say to the Senator from Rhode Island that in the Western States, in sparsely settled sections, the operation of laws of this kind is necessarily more harsh in rural sections than in a densely populated section of the country, and consequently the percentage of advantage to a merchant doing business in the commercial centers is very much greater than it would be west. In my State there was almost a universal sentiment against a bankruptcy law, but lately the sentiment has somewhat changed. Our commercial men are in favor of it, and are anxious to have a bankruptcy law; and this bill is very much less harsh than the one which was before the last Congress.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should think in sparsely settled portions of the country a longer time would be necessary than in commercial communities. It would seem to me that they would require a longer time within which to file their proceedings.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon. [Having put the question.] The Chair is in doubt; he will put the question again. [Having again put the question.] The Chair will be obliged to divide the Senate; it is impossible to determine by the sound.

There were on a division—ayes 7, noes 16; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Senator will withdraw the amendment. He can move it again in the Senate.

Mr. SLATER. I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It appears that there is no quorum present. If there be no objection——

Mr. PLATT. Let us have the yeas and nays upon agreeing to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays are demanded. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary called the roll.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. PALMER] is paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] for whatever time he is absent.

Mr. BECK. I wish to announce that, being engaged in the Committee on Appropriations, I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] upon all questions connected with this bill.

Mr. COKE. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. MAXEY] was called home on business and will be absent for some time. He is paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES].

Mr. DAWES. I stand paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] at any time when his colleague thinks that he would desire me to be so paired. I shall refrain from voting upon this question.

YEAS—14.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SAULSBURY. In section 33, line 11, I move to strike out all after the word "intent" down to and including the word "payable," in line 17, in the following words:

Or who, being actually insolvent, suffers his property to be seized on execution, and fails within twenty days thereafter to redeem the same from such seizure; or has suspended and not resumed payment of his commercial paper or open accounts, made, passed, or contracted in the course of his business, for a period of thirty days after the same were payable.

The section applies to traders who have been guilty of fraud. The words which I seek to strike out do not impute any fraud and ought not to be applied to persons who have been guilty of fraud, but simply because of their inability to pay their debts, as for instance if a man suffers an execution upon his property and does not release the execution and pay it in twenty days, it is made a cause of involuntary bankruptcy.

The language which I propose to strike out assigns causes for involuntary bankruptcy. I am opposed to the assignment of anything as a cause for involuntary bankruptcy unless there is fraud. A man's poverty ought not to be made the subject of a cause for involuntary bankruptcy. He may be poor, he may be actually insolvent, yet struggling to pay his creditors; and I think a man in those circumstances ought to have some chance in life as well as other men. Wherever there can be fraud traced to and fixed upon a debtor I am perfectly willing that his creditors shall then proceed against him and throw him into bankruptcy; but unless there are some instances of fraud, something that impeaches the honesty of the man, I am not disposed myself that he shall be cast into involuntary bankruptcy. For that reason I have moved to strike out those words. If a man owes a book account to a merchant, to a blacksmith, or to a mechanic, thirty days after it is payable it becomes a cause of involuntary bankruptcy under this section. There are a great many honest men who might be thrown into bankruptcy under that provision, and I am therefore opposed to the clause and move to strike it out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY].

Mr. HOAR. The first part of the passage proposed to be stricken out would not ordinarily affect the debtor whom the Senator from Delaware seems to commiserate. That is put in to prevent a creditor from getting an attachment or execution and getting the whole of the debtor's property, and getting all he sees against the other creditors, getting an advantage. Certainly it can make no difference to a debtor whether his property is taken on execution and sold by a single creditor, which the Senator proposes not to have interfered with by a bankruptcy law, or whether it is divided properly and fairly among his creditors, with this exception, that as the Senator wants to leave the law the debtor's property is taken by the sheriff, sold, and he does not get a discharge from anything except so far as the particular debt is paid or the execution satisfied by the seizure or execution; the other creditors do not get anything and their debts are not discharged; whereas under the bill, if the debtor after twenty days does not redeem his property from execution, then it is taken and divided equally among the creditors, and if he is honest he is discharged from all his debts.

So it seems to me it is a singular sympathy which my friend from Delaware is manifesting when he moves to strike out that part of the section. The other part relates to a distinct matter, and of course relates only in the case of commercial accounts or paper to what is called suspended payment. When the debtor for thirty days has suspended payment, then the creditors may see that the property is divided instead of it all going to a single creditor, subject, however, to a later provision, to which the Senator from Arkansas called attention. It is not necessary for me to repeat what he said. But even in that case or in any of these cases if the debtor comes in and says, "I hope and expect to make payment before a certain time," and the court finds there is a reasonable possibility, it may give him ninety days more to manage his business and settle up.

Mr. SAULSBURY. In reference to a debtor whose property has been seized on execution, there are many honest men who are a little embarrassed in their circumstances, and some creditor has issued an execution for the purpose of making himself safe, not for the purpose of closing the man out, but simply that he may have a lien upon the man's property. The man perhaps would not be closed out by the sheriff upon that execution. It is simply the effort of the creditor to secure himself, without any intention whatever of interfering any further with the debtor. He is willing to give him a chance to pay his debts, but simply desires to secure himself by a lien upon his property. Hundreds of men who have been under execution have been indulged by their creditors, and have been ultimately enabled to relieve themselves from their embarrassment, and instead of being thrown into bankruptcy have been able to adjust their debts and to continue their business. But under this provision, if some unfeeling creditor, for the purpose of securing his claim or otherwise, issues an execution against his debtor, at once the man becomes a bankrupt, and may be proceeded against and thrown into involuntary bankruptcy by his other creditors.

I have no doubt that the honorable Senator who has charge of this bill has himself in the course of his life stepped up and assisted debtors under execution and advanced the money to relieve them from the particular execution in order that they might continue their business. It is the experience of almost every man who has done any business whatever that he sometimes finds an honest debtor who is being pressed perhaps with an execution upon his property, and he will advance the money and pay his execution for him. But the provision of the bill is, if the man could not find a friend to do that within twenty days, if the execution creditor was willing to let the execution remain and not push it and close it out, it becomes a case of involuntary bankruptcy. That is a very harsh measure toward an honest debtor.

Wherever you can trace fraud in the transaction of the debtor I am willing that his creditors shall have the benefit of this measure and proceed against him; but poverty is no crime, and I am unwilling that any man who is an honest man, however poor he may be, shall be thus placed at the mercy of his creditors.

I therefore hope that my motion to strike those words from the bill will prevail.

Mr. GARLAND. Before the Senator takes his seat I wish to call his attention to a fact. I think he has omitted in his remarks to notice what are really the words upon which this whole matter turns: "Or who, being actually insolvent." In the case that he instances of a man who is not insolvent, of course he would not be declared bankrupt; they would not compel him to go into bankruptcy. The theory is, as I said before on another proposition, that the party is actually insolvent. He can not make any preference and he can not suffer his property to be disposed of, because the law already seizes hold of it to distribute it equally among his creditors.

Mr. BAYARD. That must be a condition-precedent.

Mr. GARLAND. Of course. The former act read "or who being bankrupt or insolvent, or in contemplation of bankruptcy or insolvency;" but here we put it down to actual insolvency, "who, being actually insolvent." I think the Senator from Delaware probably has failed to notice the words I have alluded to here. It is a condition-precedent, and when that occurs of course the creditors ought to be permitted to have the debtor's property which has been seized on execution and kept under execution for twenty days.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas what he means by an insolvent. Does he mean a man who has been judicially decided to be insolvent, or does he mean a man who has been in such circumstances that by general repute it is known that he is unable to pay his debts? I did notice the words quoted by the Senator, and I see that those words apply to a man who may be in such embarrassed circumstances that he can not pay his debts just at that particular time. That is the class of men I am seeking to relieve. If the man has been judicially determined to be insolvent, that is another question. Why do you not put those words in if that is the object you have in contemplation? If the purpose is to declare that every man who is unable to liquidate his debts at a particular moment is insolvent, then I say it is a harsh measure against that class of debtors and to that I am opposed to it.

If the Senator will incorporate the words "who being judicially declared insolvent by some proceeding in court," I shall have no objection to the clause; but if you are to leave it upon the general estimate that the man is insolvent because he is not able to pay his debts at a particular moment I am opposed to it; for there are hundreds and thousands of men in this country who, if called upon to pay their debts to-day, could not do it; if they had an execution upon their property they could not discharge it unless some friend stepped forward to relieve them. But yet you make that kind of a man subject to the creditors who see proper to proceed against him and throw him into bankruptcy.

It is to that provision I am opposed, and I shall vote certainly myself to strike out those words. In fact I shall vote for no measure that seeks to put any class of men who have not been guilty of fraud at the mercy of their creditors to throw them into involuntary bankruptcy. If you carry fraud home to any debtor where he has sought to defeat the collection of honest debts by fraudulent practices, I am perfectly willing that his creditors shall have all the remedies they can against him, but I shall not vote to make poverty a crime, punishable by this kind of a proceeding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY].

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unless there are further amendments to this section the reading of the bill will proceed.

Mr. GEORGE. There are some other amendments to be offered to section 33. I was waiting for some other gentleman to proceed. I know there are some others to be offered besides the one I am going to offer now, as they are not here to present their amendments at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] gave notice of an amendment to the pending section.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir; he wishes to offer an amendment to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate can return to the section at any time.

Mr. HOAR. I shall for one consent to that. The amendment of the Senator from Alabama I suppose is his amendment about speculating in futures?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. It can be put in the bill anywhere almost, in one place as well as another, if put in at all, which I hope it will not be. I will for one consent when we get to the end of the bill that the Senator from Alabama may go back and move his amendment to this section if he prefers to have it offered here, so as not to lose the time now.

Mr. GEORGE. I have two other amendments to offer to section 33 and two to offer to section 34, all of which I deem important. I did not desire to offer them until after the Senator from Alabama had offered his amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that the Secretary read on. There are a good many sections coming now that it is not likely will be sought to be amended. Let the Senator go back when we get to the end of the bill.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to go back to the sections on involuntary bankruptcy.

Mr. HOAR. We can go back when we get to the end of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Section 33 will be passed over with that understanding.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will understand that if anybody does object, he has his rights again in the Senate, so that he will be perfectly protected.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to have consent to come back to these involuntary bankruptcy provisions.

Mr. HOAR. I shall not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill at section 34 and read to the end of section 39.

Mr. BAYARD. I submitted privately to the Senator in charge of the bill yesterday an amendment, to come in at lines 4 and 5 of section 39. At present it requires one-fourth in value and number of the known creditors to enable the judge to appoint a trustee where there is a failure to select one. A gentleman of great experience in the city of Philadelphia, who held the position of register in bankruptcy, has made what I think is a very sensible suggestion, and that is to dispense with the fraction of one-fourth in value and number of the known creditors and allow the judge upon the request of any creditor to appoint a trustee where there has been a failure to elect one. His language in writing upon this subject is as follows:

> It happened under the act of 1867 that in very many cases where there were no assets creditors would fail to attend a meeting called to make the choice of assignee or trustee, or refuse to vote or take any part in the election. In such cases under the old law the register or the court would appoint. In the present bill it would seem that before the judge can appoint in case of failure, it requires that one-fourth of the creditors should make the request.

Therefore, in section 39, lines 4 and 5, I move to strike out the words "one-fourth in value and number of all known creditors," and to insert the words "any creditor;" so as to read:

> And upon request of any creditor the judge may appoint a trustee when there is a failure to elect one or a refusal to accept the trust.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD].

Mr. HOAR. I hope that amendment will be adopted. I think it is reasonable. The sentence which has occasioned the amendment about appointing a trustee where there is a failure to elect was transferred to another place, and that is the way it happened to be in there.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to suggest whether if the words are stricken out, as proposed by the Senator from Delaware, the effect will not be to put it in the power of the judge to appoint the trustee where the trustee chosen by the creditors refuses to accept. I am sure it would. Suppose a trustee has been chosen by the creditors who is interested in the estate and he refuses to accept?

Mr. BAYARD. If the Senator will read line 6 I think his criticism will be answered. It is only in case where there is a failure to elect or a refusal to accept the trust.

Mr. HARRISON. Precisely; and the point I make is that at a properly constituted creditors' meeting a trustee may be chosen, and if he refuses to serve, is it right to deprive the creditors of the right, in case they choose to select another, to make that selection, and to commit the whole matter to the judge? I agree with the Senator that where the creditors do not take interest enough in the matter to choose a trustee they ought not to defeat the proceedings and the judge ought to be allowed to appoint, but if they have chosen one and he refuses, I think they ought to be allowed to choose another.

Mr. BAYARD. I apprehend, if the Senator pleases, that there should be a harmony in the two interests which a judge would certainly respect, and as the power to choose the assignee is vested in the majority of the creditors in number and value already, that he would not against their wish make such an appointment. But this is really to provide for cases of what I may call apathy or indifference on the part of creditors. I think it is practically a wise amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I will suggest, after this is adopted, an amendment which will cover the point made by the Senator from Indiana: that is, to make it read that the judge may appoint a trustee when there is a failure to elect one, or a refusal to accept the trust and a subsequent failure to elect at the same meeting. That will come in later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is upon the motion of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] to strike out and insert.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. To meet the point made by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON], after the word "trust," in line 7, I move to insert the words "and a subsequent failure to elect by the creditors;" so as to read:

> And upon request of any creditor the judge may appoint a trustee when there is a failure to elect one, or a refusal to accept the trust and a subsequent failure to elect by the creditors.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that he extend the amendment a little by making it read "and a subsequent failure to elect by the creditors within a time to be fixed by the judge."

Mr. HOAR. Very well; there is no harm in that, though I think the judge would give it that construction. Of course the subsequent time to elect would be a reasonable time, probably at the same meeting. There is only one meeting where they can elect; therefore, under the bill without putting in that language, if the meeting terminates without electing a new one, that is a subsequent failure to elect; they can not elect at a subsequent meeting under the law.

Mr. WILSON. But they might not be able to agree at that meeting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HOAR. I will accept the suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as modified will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 39, line 7, after the word "trust," it is proposed to insert:

> And a subsequent failure to elect by the creditors within a time to be fixed by the judge.

So as to read:

> And upon request of any creditor the judge may appoint a trustee when there is a failure to elect one, or a refusal to accept the trust and a subsequent failure to elect within a time to be fixed by the judge.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to insert the words just read.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Section 39 should also be amended by inserting a semicolon at the end of the first line, after the word "trustee." The omission is a mistake of the printer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clause will be so corrected if there be no objection. The reading of the bill will proceed.

Section 40 was read.

Mr. HARRISON. The word "adimssion," in line 6, is a mistake. It should be "administration."

Mr. HOAR. There is a misprint.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The correction will be made.

Mr. HARRISON. I am not sure that that makes it right.

Mr. HOAR. It is a misprint. It should be "admission" instead of "adimssion."

Mr. HARRISON. The "allowance?"

Mr. HOAR. The allowance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the language right?

Mr. FRYE. The word is spelled wrong; that is all.

Mr. HOAR. It is a misprint. I think the word "allowance" would be better, so as to read "the allowance of debts."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts suggests that the word "adimssion," in the sixth line, be changed to "allowance." The change will be made if there be no objection. It is so ordered.

Mr. HOAR. In line 22 of section 40 three words are omitted by mistake of the printer, the words "of such trustee" after the word "duty." It should read:

And it shall be the duty of such trustee to conform to such directions unless the court for some just cause otherwise orders.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The words "of such trustee," in the twenty-second line of the fortieth section, will be inserted unless there be objection. The reading of the bill will be resumed.

The Chief Clerk read sections 41 and 42.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether in the latter part of section 42, where it avoids all liens, charges, or incumbrances, all attachments and everything of that sort, if a party who is not subject to involuntary proceedings should make any of these assignments or suffer any of these liens or judgments which would be good at the time under this proposed law, whether if he afterward applies in an involuntary proceeding in bankruptcy it would avoid those things?

Mr. HOAR. I so understand it, that a lien occasioned by a mere suit would ordinarily be the thing which would make it the duty of the debtor as an honest man to go into bankruptcy to prevent the preference of a single creditor.

Mr. GEORGE. He might have taken a different view of honesty from that under the law allowed him. I simply wanted to know what meaning was attached to it.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that. It dissolves the attachment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will be continued.

The Chief Clerk read section 43 to section 48, inclusive.

Mr. HOAR. In the second line of section 48 the word "trustees" should read "trustee."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That correction will be made.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read sections 49 to 55, inclusive.

Mr. HOAR. There was a change made in section 46, at the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON], authorizing the judge to appoint in the case of failure to elect by the creditors, or in case of refusal of the person elected, and a failure to make a new election within the time fixed by the judge, which implies that the judge might authorize a new election at a later meeting. That requires a change in line 5 of section 46 which I did not observe at the time. The Senator from Iowa has called my attention to it. I ask unanimous consent, in line 5 of that section, after the word "chosen," to strike out the words "at the first meeting" and to insert the words "by the creditors;" so as to read:

And this whether he is chosen by the creditors, or appointed by the judge or commissioner, or fills a vacancy.

I suppose there will be no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to strike out and insert certain words which he has indicated in section 46. Is there objection? There being no objection, the Senate returns to section 46, and the question is on the motion to strike out and insert.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to an amendment that I desire to offer in section 55, line 19, after the words "twelve months." With a view of preventing the sacrifice of real estate, especially in the South, I propose to add the words:

Or in three years, if the court shall think it best for the interest of the creditors.

I wish to state to the Senator from Massachusetts and to the Senate that sales of real estate in the South are usually made entirely on credit of several years, or part cash and the balance payable in one, two, and three years; and if real estate is put up at a judicial sale on as short a credit as that named in the section it would not bring one-half of its value. That is the object of the amendment I offer.

Mr. HOAR. How much do they give in the Senator's State when the sheriff sells it?

Mr. GEORGE. They give very little.

Mr. HOAR. How much time?

Mr. GEORGE. None. It is a cash sale.

Mr. HOAR. I would suggest to the Senator that three years is a very long time for keeping the entire bankruptcy proceedings open. It is better in nine cases out of ten, if there happens to be a piece of real estate that would be sacrificed, to have it sacrificed than to keep the bankruptcy proceedings open for three years. To keep the proceedings open even as long as this bill provides, twelve months, has occasioned criticism.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to say in reply to that that the amendment I offer leaves it entirely to the discretion of the judge, who shall first decide that it is best for the interest of the creditors. The language I propose is:

Or in three years, if the court shall think it best for the interest of the creditors.

I am sure if the amendment is not adopted there will be a very great sacrifice in the sales of real estate in the South.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest a mere grammatical change, to read a little better, in line 11 of section 55, where it says "the trustee shall mail a notice thereof to each creditor of the time and place of sale," to change the sentence so as to read, "the trustee shall mail to each creditor a notice of the time and place of sale." It is rather an awkward sentence. The amendment does not change the meaning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The Secretary read sections 56, 57, and 58.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether the word "in," after "reckoned," in line 10 of section 58, is not surplusage?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, it is; it should be stricken out.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to offer an amendment to section 58.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi will suspend for one moment. An amendment is pending.

Mr. GEORGE. I thought that was disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Indiana will be reported.

The SECRETARY. In section 58, line 10, it is proposed to strike out the word "in" after "reckoned;" so as to read:

But the time which elapses between the filing of the petition and the appointment and qualification of the trustee shall not be reckoned against him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. GEORGE. I move to insert in line 8, section 58, after the word "appointed," the words "nor extend the time of limitation in such case." The provision now reads in this way:

This provision shall not in any case revive a right of action barred at the time when a trustee is appointed.

And the amendment is—

Nor extend the time of limitation in such case.

Mr. HOAR. I do not see any objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. In order to carry out that idea, I move, in line 10, after the word "trustee," to insert "first qualified."

Mr. HOAR. That simply expresses in words what I suppose would be held to be the meaning of the sentence without it. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. I suggest now whether it would not be better to strike out the words "against him," at the close of line 10 and beginning of line 11, and say "shall not be reckoned" against any one.

Mr. HOAR. There is no reason why that time should be deducted as against the other party. The other party is not under any disqualification.

Mr. GEORGE. I have another amendment to offer: at the end of the section to insert "except in cases of concealed fraud;" so as to read:

The trustee shall be allowed to cancel his bond immediately upon favorable review of his administration by the court; and any and all actions against said trustee shall be barred by the final adjustment of the estate, except in cases of concealed fraud.

Mr. HOAR. That of course reopens the entire estate. I suppose the object was to meet in this law the difficulty which the Senator from Kansas complained of in the other and which he introduced a special bill at the last session to meet, and that is the keeping these bankruptcy matters forever open, undisposed of. The idea was to have some time when as against all mankind this thing is closed, when the bondsman has no further responsibility for his principal, and when nobody can come and bring all the creditors and all this machinery back again into court. Whether it would not be better on the whole to adhere to the strict limitation of the bill I am not quite sure. I do not think the Senator's amendment will do any harm.

Mr. FRYE. It is not against the bondsman.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. GEORGE. The object is that where the trustee shall confessedly conceal fraud in the settlement of his accounts, there shall be no bar until there is a discovery of the fraud.

Mr. HOAR. I do not object if the Senator insists on it.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that if the amendment he has proposed be adopted, the ordinary rule that the statute would begin to run from the discovery of the fraud would not apply; but in the case of a concealed fraud there would be no limitation at all.

Mr. GEORGE. I think the statute would commence running from the time the fraud was discovered. That is the ordinary rule.

Mr. HARRISON. I know it is the ordinary rule; but we are adopting here a special statute of limitation, and unless that is incorporated here I should think it would not be the rule, but that there would be no limit at all.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator suggest that that ought to be expressed as a part of the amendment?

Mr. HARRISON. I think it ought to be expressed that it should not be brought longer than two years or one year after the discovery of the fraud.

Mr. GEORGE. I will put it one year after the discovery of the fraud.

Mr. HOAR. I think six months would be long enough.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well; I will put it at six months:

And the time of six months is allowed after the discovery of the fraud.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi modifies his amendment. The amendment will be reported as modified.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to section 58:

Except in cases of concealed fraud, and in such cases the time of six months is allowed after the discovery of the fraud.

Mr. HOAR. Say "in such cases such actions may be brought within six months from such discovery."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as reported does not carry out the idea.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well, let it be modified by adding "in which such action may be brought."

Mr. FRYE. That is not needed.

The clause now reads:

And any and all actions against said trustee shall be barred by the final adjustment of the estate.

And then to add "except in six months after discovery of the fraud" is all that is necessary to secure a bar in six months after discovery.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi will reduce his amendment to writing, and the next section will be read meanwhile.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well.

Section 59 was read.

Mr. GEORGE. Referring back to section 58 I offer my amendment in this form; I move to add to the section:

Except that in cases of concealed fraud actions may be commenced within six months after the discovery thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I want to ask the Senator from Massachusetts as to the effect of the last clause of section 59:

In case of the refusal of the court to grant a discharge to any bankrupt, the proof of debt filed in such proceeding shall be considered, for all intents and purposes, as a judgment roll, and like proceedings may be had for the collection of such debt, less the amount paid thereon for dividends, as in the case of an ordinary judgment.

I suppose the intention was that the proofs of debt in these cases should be treated as a judgment entered against the debtor for that amount; but, if so, I submit that the bill ought to have some provision for putting them upon the more permanent records of the court as judgments, because if the proceedings under this bill are like those under the bankrupt law of 1867 those proofs are in paper; there is no judgment docket made up of the allowances with any date and amount. It seems to me if that provision is retained there ought to be some provision made for transferring them to the judgment docket of the circuit or district court, so that they would be accessible to those who inquire for liens against the property of any person; and there ought also to be some provision as to the relative date from which these liens were to be calculated; that is, whether a proof made to-day of a claim takes precedence as a judgment of this date against proof made to-morrow or next day in the course of the bankruptcy proceedings. It seems to me that that provision is left indefinite and that it ought to have some such provision as I have suggested.

I am sure it will lead to great trouble if proofs are made under this bill (and I am not familiar enough with it to know whether they are), and the records are kept as they were under the former law, and you treat the claims allowed as judgments of the United States courts. Unless provision is made for some judgment record and unless some definite regulation is made as to the date from which they are to operate as liens, I see no reason why, if they are to be treated as judgment liens, they should not all be treated as of one date, and perhaps the date of the decree refusing the discharge, or some such provision.

Mr. HOAR. The suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana certainly is a very weighty one. The operation of this law is, of course, to suspend all the ordinary methods of proceeding for the collection of debts by the creditor. His suit is dismissed on motion in any court of the United States, either State or national, and he is prohibited from bringing his suit. It is an answer to the suit that these proceedings are pending. That being the case, suppose the debtor does not get his discharge, the creditor ought not to have the statute of limitations running against him while he could not lawfully prosecute his suit. Perhaps it has been the only thing that has saved the statute of limitations, and he has been dismissed from the court in consequence of the provisions of this bill. So the idea of this section is that there should be a judgment, that the proof should itself operate as a new judgment for the amount proved. Of course in many cases there would be a partial dividend, which would reduce the amount. I do not know how it may be in other parts of the country, but in all the bankruptcy proceedings that I have had any experience with, and I rather think that will prove to be true everywhere, there is drawn off in the United States courts a sheet, which is preserved by the clerk of the court, containing the list of debts proved and the amount.

Mr. HARRISON. But it does not go upon any judgment docket; it is not indexed; it is not put in shape for convenient ascertainment by those who are searching the records for title.

Mr. HOAR. But I was coming to that presently. The creditor of course will know whether he has proved his claim, and he will know where to go to find this new judgment; but we have no experience in our part of the country of a condition of things where a judgment itself is a lien. There is no such thing as a judgment lien in any New England State or in any Eastern State so far as I am aware at the present time. When the execution is issued and the sheriff seizes any particular piece of real estate he makes a record of his seizure in the office where deeds are recorded, where all titles are recorded, so that this section needs no amendment or addition so far as any community with which I am familiar is concerned.

But the Senator reminds me, what I did not think of before, that there are States in the Union where the mere entry of a judgment operates as a lien upon all the debtor's land within the jurisdiction of the court. That is a defect in the bill. It should have been foreseen. I did not foresee it. So I think it would be better to reserve the section and have an amendment, carefully considered, something like this: requiring the creditor proving his debt, if he desires to make it a lien upon the debtor's estate, to cause it to be entered on the docket of the court as ordinary judgments. Of course it is no improper burden on him; and then some reasonable provision that a man whose claim is proved to-day shall not have a lien in preference to the man who proves his to-morrow. I would like, however, before dealing with this question, to ask the Senator does a judgment in his State operate as a lien on after-acquired real estate?

Mr. HARRISON. The question of priority as to after-acquired real estate would be settled by the levy of the execution after it operates.

Mr. HOAR. Is it a lien?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, it would become so.

Mr. HOAR. That is, suppose I have not a dollar of real estate in the State of Indiana and the Senator gets a judgment against me, and I inherit twelve months hence a piece of real estate in Indiana, does that judgment without any other proceeding become a lien?

Mr. HARRISON. Undoubtedly it becomes a lien from the very date that the title vests in the case supposed by the Senator; but if there were two judgments against the Senator the question of priority would be settled by the earliest levy.

Mr. HOAR. Of course all the existing real estate of the debtor goes into the bankruptcy proceedings and all liens on that are dissolved by the bankruptcy proceeding. So if you give the creditor a right to have his claim indexed in the judgment docket, if he sees fit at any time, there is no occasion for any provision as to priority between two creditors unless the judgment of to-day operates as a lien on future-acquired real estate, which I did not suppose it would, but the Senator knows better than I do about that. I understand the Senator to say that it does.

Mr. MILLER, of California. It certainly does in my State.

Mr. HOAR. If that be true in any State of the Union there ought to be a carefully prepared addition to this section to provide for that case. If the Senate will consent to reserve the section I will ask the Senator from Indiana to prepare an amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. I would rather the Senator from Massachusetts, who has charge of the bill and who can preserve its relations better than I, should do so; but I want to make an additional suggestion to him: It seems to me that the better way would be to provide not upon suggestion or motion of the creditor, but to provide absolutely in such cases that the debts unpaid and proved against the bankrupt should be transferred to and entered upon the judgment docket of the court. I think it would be better, then, in order to settle these questions of priority, that they should be really treated as one judgment, and that anything realized from execution thereafter should be divided among these unpaid debts against the bankrupt's estate equally, precisely as it would have been if the money had been received and distributed by the trustee. In other words, it is treated as one judgment with a specification of the amount coming to different creditors, and if execution issues it issues for the whole amount, and whatever is realized is divided. It seems to me that is the fairer way.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that the Secretary proceed with the reading until 5 o'clock, and then I will move an adjournment unless the Senate desire to remain longer, which is not likely, and I will prepare an amendment to cover the difficulty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This section will be passed over, and the reading of the bill will proceed.

Sections 60 to 70 inclusive were read.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question in relation to section 70. There are some district courts which have circuit-court powers. I desire to know what kind of revision is provided for in cases pending in those courts, or whether there is any.

Mr. HOAR. That depends on the general law as applicable to those courts, as I understand. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] can answer that question a great deal better than I, because he is familiar with one of those jurisdictions.

Mr. GARLAND. It would depend, as the Senator from Massachusetts has said, on the revisory power generally over those courts. We passed a general law on the 3d of March, 1879, for example, giving the right of review to the circuit judges over those district judges who exercise circuit-court powers. This bill, without some amendment, would be held to refer to that general supervisory power.

Mr. GEORGE. But would there be a supervisory power?

Mr. GARLAND. No doubt of it. That was the opinion of the committee when it had the bill under consideration.

Section 71 was read.

Mr. GARLAND. We are coming now to a point of importance, and I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved by the Senator from Arkansas that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, April 15, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. ALBERT R. STUART, D. D.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. BEACH. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of so much of the Journal as relates to the introduction of bills and joint resolutions.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the remainder of the Journal, which as read was approved.

BUILDING FOR SIGNAL SERVICE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, submitting a plan and estimates for a building for the use of the Signal Service; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

UNIVERSITY OF ALABAMA.

Mr. OATES. I ask unanimous consent to move that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 503) to increase the endowment of the University of Alabama from the public lands in said State, and that the bill be brought before the House for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That 46,080 acres of the public lands in Alabama are hereby granted to the State of Alabama, in addition to the lands reserved to said State by the acts approved April 20, 1818, and March 2, 1819, for the benefit of the University of Alabama, to be applied, as far as may be necessary, to the erection of suitable buildings for said university and to the restoration of the library and scientific apparatus heretofore destroyed by fire, such application to be made in such manner as the Legislature of said State may direct or may empower the trustees of said university to direct: Provided, That the State of Alabama shall pay the expenses of agents appointed by the governor thereof to select such lands, to be reimbursed out of the proceeds of the sales thereof.

SEC. 2. That the governor of Alabama may appoint one or more agents to select the lands granted in this act from any public lands within said State not included in some subsisting grant made by the United States; and such agent shall make report of such selections to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 3. That the provisions of this act shall not apply to any legal subdivision of land to which the right of homestead entry or pre-emption shall have attached in favor of any person who is entitled to such homestead and pre-emption entries, and who is occupying and claiming such subdivision of the public lands in Alabama at the time when such selections are approved by the Secretary of the Interior. And in cases where it is found that such claims are superior to the rights of the State of Alabama herein granted, the said State may select other lands in lieu thereof, and in like quantity, elsewhere in the said State, from the public lands of the United States, so as to make up, as nearly as may be, the total number of acres of land granted in this act to said State.

SEC. 4. That when the selections of said lands are so made, and are approved by the Secretary of the Interior, the title to the same shall vest in the State of Alabama, to and for the use and benefit of said University of Alabama, to be applied first to the uses and purposes declared in the first section of this act, and then to the endowment of said university, and to no other purpose whatever; and patents shall issue to said State for the lands so selected and approved. And the State of Alabama shall by law direct the sale of such lands; and the money arising from such sales shall be paid into the treasury of the State of Alabama; but no expenses that may be incurred in making such sales, after the selections of lands made under this act are confirmed by the Secretary of the Interior and are entered on the township maps of the proper land offices, shall be paid by the United States.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior is empowered to make all needful and proper regulations and rules for carrying this act into effect, and for the decision of all questions that may arise as to the right of the State of Alabama to any lands that may be claimed under the provisions of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. The bill is quite a long one, and the subject of it is very interesting. I desire to reserve the right to object until the gentleman from Alabama gives an explanation.

Mr. OATES. If the gentleman from Indiana will withhold his objection and the House will allow me one minute for explanation I think no one would object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from Alabama making a brief explanation, the right to object to the consideration of the bill being reserved?

There was no objection.

Mr. OATES. The bill provides for giving to the State University in Alabama 46,000 acres of lands, to be selected from the public lands within the State of Alabama. This is in consequence of the loss and destruction of the buildings there when occupied by the United States troops in 1865. The University of the State of Alabama was a very flourishing institution, and about the close of the war a portion of the Army of the United States came there, and the soldiers occupied the university buildings, which, I suppose unintentionally and probably by accident, took fire and were burned, nearly all of them. The loss by the destruction of the property, in addition to a valuable library of 30,000 volumes, was estimated at $240,000. Since that time the State of Alabama, impoverished as it was, has been as liberal as it could be in contributing money to replace those buildings, but it has not been able to do it. This bill simply grants a portion of the public lands in Alabama to be used in replacing the necessary buildings of the university. The bill has been before the Committee on Public Lands of this House, and has a unanimous report in its favor from that committee. I trust no gentleman will object to it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have always been opposed to any disposal of the public lands except for purposes of settlement. But inasmuch as the Committee on Public Lands are unanimously agreed in favor of the bill, and as the facts stated by the gentleman from Alabama present a stronger case than usual in behalf of this institution, I do not feel justified in interposing an objection, although I regret to see any measure authorizing a departure from what I think should be the fundamental principle of the Government in dealing with its public lands, that they are not for sale, but that they are designed for homes for the people. Unless this were for the benefit of an educational institution I should object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. OATES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER AT DUBUQUE.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent to have the bill (H. R. 450) taken from the House Calendar for present consideration, together with an amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 450) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a ponton wagon-bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the city of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa."

Be it enacted, &c., That the act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a ponton wagon-bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the city of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa," be amended by striking out of section 2 of said act the words "that the bridge shall be constructed with a suitable ponton draw of not less than five hundred feet in width, located over the main channel of the river," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "that the bridge shall be constructed with a ponton draw or draws of such length and location as shall be ordered by the Secretary of War."

The amendment proposed by the Committee on Commerce was read, as follows:

Add to the bill at the end thereof the following words:

"Provided, That said draw or draws shall not be less than four hundred feet in length."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LADIES' WAITING-ROOM.

Mr. BLACKBURN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and is hereby, directed to purchase the necessary furniture and carpeting for the ladies' waiting-room, subject to the approval of the Committee on Accounts, and to pay for the same out of the contingent fund of the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have reprinted——

Mr. CASSIDY. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I rise to make a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will submit it.

PURCHASE OF WOOD FOR USE OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. The Committee on Accounts unanimously instruct me to report back to the House and recommend the adoption of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be authorized and directed to purchase by private contract and without advertising therefor twenty cords of best oak wood for immediate use of the House of Representatives, said purchase to be made under the direction of the Committee on Accounts, and the wood to be paid for out of the contingent fund of the House.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COX, of New York. I ask consent, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been called for.

Mr. COX, of New York. I understand that that has been withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR] when the regular order was demanded.

Mr. CASSIDY. I will withdraw the demand for the regular order for a time.

SUPPORT OF COMMON SCHOOLS.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I ask unanimous consent that part 2 of Report No. 495 be reprinted. The number already printed has been exhausted.

The SPEAKER. That portion of the report containing the views of the minority?

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. The views of the minority on House bill 4980, to aid temporarily in the support of common schools.

Mr. WILLIS. Why not let both parts of the report be reprinted?

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR] asks consent that the report of the majority, with the views of the minority, on House bill 4980, to aid temporarily in the support of common schools, be reprinted for the use of the House.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ENSIGN L. K. REYNOLDS.

Mr. COX, of New York. I am instructed unanimously by the Committee on Naval Affairs to ask consent to report back for present consideration Senate joint resolution No. 26, granting permission to Ensign L. K. Reynolds, United States Navy, to accept the decoration of the Royal and Imperial Order of Francis Joseph from the Government of Austria.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That Ensign L. K. Reynolds, United States Navy, be, and he is hereby, granted permission to accept the decoration of the Royal and Imperial Order of Francis Joseph, awarded him by the Austrian Government, in recognition of heroic conduct in saving the lives of the crew of the Austrian bark Olivo, November 24, 1879.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution which has just been read.

Mr. FINERTY. I object.

Mr. COX, of New York. I hope that I will be allowed to make a statement, as other gentlemen have been heard on their propositions.

Mr. FINERTY. I will hear the gentleman, reserving the right to object.

Mr. COX, of New York. Ensign Reynolds, who is the beneficiary of this little joint resolution, goes off very soon on the Greely relief expedition. That is why the Committee on Naval Affairs recommend immediate action on the joint resolution. The only objection that has been made to it is that this testimonial is a badge of royalty. I have here a letter from the Austrian minister showing that that is an entire mistake.

A year and a half ago Ensign Reynolds, at the Azores, rescued twelve men from the Austrian-Hungarian bark Olivo, at the risk of his own life, by jumping into the sea during a hurricane. His courage has been recognized by our Life-Saving Service, by the Boston and New York societies, and at last by the Austrian-Hungarian Government, who have sent him this medal.

There can be no objection to allowing him to accept this medal. It is not a badge of nobility; it is only a badge of humanity. I therefore ask that before this man departs on his dangerous mission this joint resolution may be passed. It is just the same thing as giving a medal of our own Life-Saving Service.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Those of us who are opposed to all this tomfoolery are willing to allow it to come up if a short time for discussion is permitted; otherwise we must object.

Mr. FINERTY. I am perfectly willing to allow discussion on this subject, as the gentleman from New York has had his say. If he agrees to that, I will not object.

Mr. COX, of New York. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. MORRISON. I call for the regular order.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for, which is the call of committees for reports. The morning hour begins at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.

LINCOLN NATIONAL BANK, NEBRASKA.

Mr. BUCKNER, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 5966) to change the name of the Marsh National Bank of Lincoln, Nebr., to that of the Capital National Bank of Lincoln; which was placed on the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SIGNAL STATIONS ON NANTUCKET.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 3890) to establish signal stations upon the island of Nantucket and submarine telegraphic communication with the mainland; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

BRIDGE OVER WHITE RIVER, ARKANSAS.

Mr. DUNN, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 6264) to authorize the Arkansas Midland Railroad Company to build a bridge over the White River in the State of Arkansas; which was placed on the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SAINT CLOUD WATER-POWER AND MILL COMPANY.

Mr. SEYMOUR, from the Committee on Commerce, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 3678, a bill (H. R. 6657) granting the consent of Congress to the Saint Cloud Water-Power and Mill Company to construct a dam across the Mississippi River at Saint Cloud, Minn.; which was read a first and second time, placed on the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES MARINE HOSPITAL AT NEW ORLEANS.

Mr. BARKSDALE, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 2211) to construct, maintain, and support a floating ward or hospital in connection with the United States marine hospital at New Orleans; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

AMERICAN PAPERS TO BARGE PIRATE.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 4539) to issue American papers to the lighter or barge Pirate, now at New York; which was placed on the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SAC AND FOX INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 5350, a bill (H. R. 6658) to provide for the sale of the Sac and Fox Indian reservation, in the States of Nebraska and Kansas, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CITIZENSHIP OF INDIANS.

Mr. GRAVES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 4057, a bill (H. R. 6659) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to create a commission to try and to dispose of claims for citizenship in the Cherokee, Choctaw, Creek, Chickasaw, and Seminole Indian Nations; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

KAW OR KANSAS INDIAN SCRIP.

Mr. PEEL, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 4709) for the payment of Kaw or Kansas Indian scrip, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PENSIONS.

Mr. MATSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 4911) to pension soldiers and sailors for disabilities in addition to loss of a leg or an arm; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. MATSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 1652) to grant pensions for service in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps of the United States during the war of the rebellion; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. MATSON. I ask consent that the minority of the committee have leave to present their views in writing upon the bill just reported.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the minority of the committee will have leave to file their views, to be printed with the report of the majority.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ABRAHAM J. REBER.

Mr. STRUBLE, from the Committee on Pensions, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 2025, a bill (H. R. 6660) rerating Abraham J. Reber and granting him arrears of pension; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

FRANCES H. PLUMMER.

Mr. ROWELL, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 4442) for the relief of Frances H. Plummer; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PROTECTION FROM FIRE IN HOTELS, ETC.

Mr. FIEDLER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 933) to provide for the better protection of life against fire in hotels and lodging-houses in the District of Columbia; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

REFUND OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA ASSESSMENTS.

Mr. FIEDLER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, also reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 2860) making appropriation for the refunding of two-thirds the amount of assessment made under the act of Congress approved July 8, 1870, upon the property-holders owning property on Pennsylvania avenue from First street to Fifteenth street, and Louisiana avenue from the intersection of Four-and-a-half street to Seventh street, in the city of Washington, D. C., during the year 1871, for street improvements on said avenues; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC GARDENS OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. SINGLETON, from the Committee on the Library, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 1226) for the consolidation of the public gardens of Washington; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

BARTHOLDI FOUNTAIN.

Mr. SINGLETON, from the Committee on the Library, also reported back adversely the joint resolution (H. Res. 45) providing for the removal and relocation of the Bartholdi fountain; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

HOMESTEAD-LAW MONUMENT.

Mr. SINGLETON, from the Committee on the Library, also reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 5438) granting lands in aid of the erection of a monument commemorative of the homestead law.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, this bill will be laid on the table.

Mr. COX, of New York. I ask that it be placed on the Calendar.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

FORBES'S HISTORICAL ART COLLECTION.

Mr. SINGLETON, from the Committee on the Library, also reported back the bill (H. R. 6339) providing for the purchase of Forbes's historical art collection; when the Committee on the Library was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

STATUE OF JAMES A. GARFIELD.

Mr. SINGLETON, from the Committee on the Library, also reported back a communication from the Secretary of War submitting a letter from Col. A. F. Rockwell, of the United States Army, relative to the statue of James A. Garfield; when the Committee on the Library was discharged from the further consideration of the same, and it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. COX, of New York, from the Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 3672) to improve the civil service by relieving the legislative officers from the performance of executive functions; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

APPOINTMENTS IN CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. LYMAN, from the Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 6186) making persons honorably discharged after service in the Army or Navy of the United States during the late war eligible to certain appointments in the civil service without the examination now required by law; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WESTERN DISTRICT OF VIRGINIA.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 3454) to amend section 572 of the Revised Statutes so as to provide for the holding of the regular terms of the district courts for the western district of Virginia; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

COMMERCIAL TRAVELERS.

Mr. BREWER, of New Jersey, from the Committee on Manufactures, reported back the bill (H. R. 986) to regulate the commerce between the States pertaining to commercial travelers; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL MEMBERS OF TERRITORIAL LEGISLATURES.

Mr. LAWRENCE, from the Committee on Territories, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 1674) to provide for additional members of the Legislatures of the several Territories and an increase of pay to the members and officers thereof; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PRINTING TESTIMONY.

Mr. TALBOTT, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the subcommittee on naval affairs having in charge the inquiry into the Jeannette expedition have leave to print the testimony given before them from day to day for the use of the House and the committee.

Mr. TALBOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced the passage of joint resolution (H. Res. 224) granting certain publications to the Cincinnati Loan Law Library, with amendments; in which concurrence was requested.

It further announced the adoption of a resolution to correct an error in the bill (S. 1063) to amend the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; in which concurrence was requested.

TARIFF.

Mr. MORRISON. I move the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of revenue bills.

Several members asked for a division on the question.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. KELLEY. I hope there will be no embarrassment interposed to going into the committee, as the point can be made at a later stage after the tariff bill shall be reached.

The SPEAKER. The demand for the yeas and nays is withdrawn, and on the division the ayes seem to have it. It is so ordered.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in committee for the consideration of revenue bills, and the Clerk will report the title of the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The bill (H. R. 5893) to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes.

Mr. MORRISON. I presume there is no objection to dispensing with the reading of the bill. Therefore I ask, by unanimous consent, that it be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I object to the consideration of that bill.

Mr. KELLEY. I also object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection having been made to the consideration of the bill, under the rules the committee will rise and report the objection to the House for its action.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5893) to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes, when objection was made, and the committee accordingly rose, and under the rules he was directed to report the objection to the House.

The SPEAKER. The question before the House on the objection reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is, Shall the committee proceed to consider the bill which has been objected to?

Mr. KELLEY. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays, in order to save time.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 140, nays 138, not voting 44; as follows:

So the House determined to proceed with the consideration of the bill.

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. FOLLETT with Mr. CONNOLLY, on all political questions. Mr. FOLLETT would vote for consideration, and Mr. CONNOLLY against, on this bill.

Mr. NICHOLLS with Mr. WHITE, of Minnesota, on all political questions and on the consideration of the tariff bill. Mr. WHITE, of Minnesota, would vote for the consideration and Mr. NICHOLLS against.

Mr. FYAN with Mr. PETTIBONE, on all political questions.

Mr. RANKIN with Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. Mr. ROBINSON, if present, would vote against the Morrison bill at every stage.

Mr. MORGAN with Mr. MORRILL.

Mr. COOK with Mr. CULLEN.

Mr. SHELLEY with Mr. THOMAS.

Mr. BURNES with Mr. CALKINS.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of New York, with Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois.

Mr. DARGAN with Mr. BRUMM.

Mr. GIBSON with Mr. SMALLS.

Mr. LEWIS with Mr. MCCORMICK.

Mr. COVINGTON with Mr. HOLTON.

Mr. BROADHEAD with Mr. BAYNE. Mr. BROADHEAD would vote for the consideration, Mr. BAYNE against the bill at all stages.

Mr. HILL with Mr. HOUK.

Mr. CLEMENTS with Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana.

Mr. REAGAN with Mr. STEPHENSON.

Mr. MOULTON with Mr. WAIT.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York, with Mr. BREWER, of New York.

Mr. LOWRY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in his seat when his name was called?

Mr. LOWRY. I can not say that I had quite reached it.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from Indiana is within the rule.

Mr. LOWRY. If permitted to vote I would vote in favor of taking up the bill. I was at the moment out of my seat attending to some emergent business for constituents. This is the only important roll-call at which I have not been in my seat during the session. There have been two exceptions only and they were instances of little importance. I had assurance that if here at this hour I would be in good time, and had also arranged to be notified. But if the one vote is necessary to success I hope a motion to reconsider will immediately be made, and as I am now within the bar my vote will still count and secure the consideration of the measure.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House the Chair cannot entertain the request of the gentleman.

Mr. COVINGTON. I am paired with Mr. HOLTON, who is absent, sick. If he were present, he would vote "no." I should vote "ay" on this question.

Mr. CRISP. My colleague, Mr. CLEMENTS, is detained by sickness. If he were present, he would vote "ay."

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move to dispense with the recapitulation of the names.

Mr. RUSSELL. I object.

Mr. STORM. My colleague, Mr. CONNOLLY, was called away by reason of a death in his family. If he were present, he would vote "no."

Mr. VALENTINE. During the reading of the pairs there was so much confusion in the Hall that I think it likely some gentlemen have been announced as paired who have voted. I therefore ask that the names of those paired be again read.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the list will be read again.

Objection was made.

Mr. MILLS. My colleague, Judge REAGAN, is detained from the House in consequence of sickness.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded, amid loud applause.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, in which amendments the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

THE TARIFF.

The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee, under instructions from the House, will proceed with the consideration of the bill to which objection was made.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Chairman, information comes to us from the executive branch of the Government that the people are burdened with unnecessary taxes and contribute annually large sums to the public Treasury not necessary for public uses. The majority of the House is justly held responsible both for its legislation and its neglect to legislate. The fact that our customs or tariff revenue is not limited to the necessities of the Government is, so far as I know, not questioned by any member of the majority here where bills to reduce as well as to raise revenue must originate. While taxation is admitted by all to be excessive, the extent to which its burdens are imposed directly and indirectly in excess of the requirements of the Government is the subject of much diversity of opinion. The amount of annual surplus is dependent upon the speed with which we pay the public debt.

The Treasury estimate of expenditure, including such annual payment on the public debt as is enjoined by the law under which the debt was made, is for the current year $40,000,000 and for next year $60,000,000 less than the estimated revenues on the basis of existing laws. The Treasury estimate of annual surplus may, therefore, be fairly stated at $50,000,000. Of this needless taxation and surplus with their attendant aggravated evils we can not fail to relieve the people without flagrant disregard of public duty.

REDUCTION OF TAXES ONLY REFORM PRACTICABLE.

It is not claimed that the bill reported by the committee will afford all the relief demanded of the people's representatives. It is but an advance toward and a promise of more complete revenue reform, to attain which a general revision of the tariff and a more equitable adjustment of rates on its long list of dutiable articles is essential. Such a revision and adjustment was believed to be unattainable at the present session of Congress. A bill was therefore reported having for its chief purpose the reduction of taxes. It will create no surprise that in the opinion of the minority members of the committee the bill is not sufficiently harmonious in its relations to be approved by them or by protectionists generally. They find in it no merit because, as they allege, it proposes to reduce duties "alike," and without regard to particular industries. To protectionists any measure is without harmony and without merit which deprives their favorites of any bounty, though such measure but responds to the statement of the fiscal officer of the Government that, "The question still presses, what legislation is necessary to relieve the people of unnecessary taxes?"

It would be only just to correct the inequalities in the present law by an increased tax or duty on wool, tin-plates, cotton-ties and wire-rods, say our opponents who find neither harmony nor merit in a tax bill which only reduces taxes.

HORIZONTAL REDUCTION.

A reduction "alike" or horizontal is not the most logical or best, but none other was practicable. Protectionists oppose it not because it is to them illogical in its method of reduction, but because it is a reduction at all. The late revision, after leaving the hands of the manufacturers and their Tariff Commission, was completed in conference, of which three leading members were Messrs. MORRILL, KELLEY, and SHERMAN, who have made all the tariffs of the last 25 years. They are the chief architects of the present system, and it will not be lightly said by the friends of the system that the revision as it came from such hands was not consistent and harmonious. They laid some duties as low as 10, others as high as 100 per cent. and higher. These are to be reduced 20 per cent., or to 8 and 80. Relatively they remain the same. To the people they will be a little lighter.

This horizontal or equal method is not new. In 1872 it was adopted to reduce and in 1875 again to increase the tariff—this too by those who now find in it no merit.

Once deprive the system of its enormous bounties and the right adjustment of rates will be a matter of easy accomplishment.

TAXES WILL BE MORE REDUCED THAN REVENUE.

Gentlemen are disturbed lest revenues will increase under the bill. Professedly they are alarmed at the possibility of taking less of the people's earnings while putting more money in the people's Treasury. The enactment of a law that would accomplish this should not be classed among national calamities.

The bill will decrease the revenue and lessen the burden of taxation in largely increased proportion.

There are now but few duties which do not much exceed revenue rates. Except as to these the reduced duties will leave our own products above the level of fair competition, and our own people will in the future, as always in the past, supply their own wants by their own matchless skill. The year 1860 was a time of plenty. With a tariff too low for revenue—lower by one-half than that we now offer to modify—we had in fourteen years less than two of adversity, more than twelve of wonderful progress. The laborer for wages was at least as well and the grower of grain better paid than they are in this year 1884, and in that year, 1860, of bounteous plenty our importations of foreign goods were less to the person, or in proportion to population, than in the years 1880–1882. (I.)

FREE SALT, COAL, AND LUMBER.

To the list of articles now imported free of duty, amounting to nearly one-third of all our importations, it is proposed to add salt, coal, wood, and lumber. Salt is already freed from tax for fishermen, also for the exporter of meats, to lessen the cost of food to the people of other countries, not for our own; coal is untaxed for use on vessels having by law the exclusive right to the coasting trade, or engaged in the foreign carrying trade—a privilege denied to persons engaged in other pursuits. Such privileges and exemptions should not be confined to the few, but extended to all. It is now more than twelve years since the protectionists themselves, the late President Garfield among them, passed a bill in the House placing coal and salt on the free-list. Since then they have done nothing which so much commended them to the people.

The revenue from wood and lumber imported and hereafter to be admitted free of duty has in the ten years last past not much exceeded $10,000,000, or $1,000,000 per annum. The census returns show the domestic wooden products to exceed $500,000,000 per annum. If the average duty of 20 per cent. on the imported wood adds but 10 per cent. to the price of that produced here, its increased cost to the people has been $50,000,000 per annum, or $500,000,000 in the ten years. In these ten years, under pretense of taxing this article to secure $10,000,000 of revenue, we have compelled the people to pay $500,000,000 in bounty to encourage the destruction of forests and the felling of trees; and in the same time we have given more than 18,000,000 acres of land under the timber-culture act as bounty to encourage the planting of other trees and other forests.

HIDDEN AND CONCEALED ENORMITIES OF PRESENT LAW.

In the estimates made by Mr. Evans, a clerk of experience in the Bureau of Statistics, which actual payments on importations show to be but estimates though based on official data, it appears the bill would leave in the cottons but two articles—of cotton yarns, not the finest—dutiable above 40 per cent.; in woolens but one coarse carpet wool, which we do not produce, above 60 per cent., and in iron and steel but few above 50 per cent. These rates have been fixed as the limit above which on these articles no duty shall be collected. The present rate on the finest cotton is 40 per cent., and yet it is an unquestioned fact, as shown by invoices and payments made, that duties exceeding 100 per cent. (exceeding the first cost) are exacted and paid on cotton goods the duty upon which is, in the estimates referred to, stated to be less than 20 per cent. The same is true of iron and steel in different degrees. In the woolen schedule these abuses are most glaring. In all they result from enormities hidden and concealed both in classification of articles and rates of duty. The limit of 40, 50, and 60 per cent. on the cotton, metal, and woolen schedules is intended to expose and remedy these hidden enormities.

There are those who assume the virtue of a willingness to abate something from custom-house taxes, and aspire to be counted revenue reformers, but do not find in this measure the relief demanded by them. Those really desirous of affording some relief from existing abuses will not fail to find their opportunity in removing taxes yeilding $8,000,000 on sugar, as much on cotton and woolen goods, and $14,000,000 on other articles used in every home.

MORRILL TARIFF AND WAR INCREASE.

In March, 1861, the tariff of previous years, sometimes named in contradictory terms a "free-trade tariff," gave place to the Morrill tariff, which the House had passed early in 1860, and which its author at the time said "would place our people on a level of fair competition with the rest of the world." Goods which were imported under this tariff act of March, 1861, for $100 must pay to-day $155. An increase resulting from war rates and additions under various pretexts still remains, averaging 55 per cent. of the former duty, and on many articles double as much. The reductions proposed are so limited as never to place our people below but to leave them far above the level of fair competition on which the Morrill tariff placed them. This is proposed in the hope that there might be no division among the people's representatives on the "question" which "still presses what legislation is necessary to relieve the people from unnecessary taxes."

Duties sufficient for protection in 1861 ought to be more than sufficient after twenty-five years. It is a cardinal faith of the protectionist, so far as he has any faith not measured in dollars and cents, that protection cheapens production, strengthens productive power, and fits its favorites for less dependence upon the bounty of the Government. Why, then, may we not expect to have their co-operation in a reduction of taxes so moderate? And shall we not have the co-operation of their incidental allies? Or must they make up in works what they lack in faith, and still give and give to the miserable system dying of its own excesses?

LATE REVISION ONLY REDUCTION IN NAME.

In executive communications, and in the report which I had the honor to make on behalf of the committee, it has been already shown that the executive branch of the Government, its fiscal officer or department, the Tariff Commission, and the people were during the last Congress in entire accord as to the necessity of a substantial reduction of tariff taxes, and that all the agencies charged with that duty have failed to do more than make a reduction in name, not in fact. In other words, all the agencies chosen to revise and reduce the tariff, including the two Houses of Congress, have been deceived themselves, and for a time deceived the people, into the belief that they had been relieved from the payment of unnecessary taxes they are yet compelled to pay.

The official statement appended (II) shows that the average cost of importing goods valued at $100 was only $1.74 less under the new than under the old law, and that the average cost or duty under the new law is 41 (40.91) per cent.

It is also shown that the late revision and alleged reduction of duties has not been followed by increased but by reduced importations resulting in less revenue; that the largely increased protective rates made in some branches of all leading industries have not been followed by increased compensation to the workers in these industries, but the reduction of wages begun before the revision has been continued and often followed by further reductions; and that our manufacturing capacity exceeds the wants of our own people, resulting in lower wages, loss of employment, enforced idleness, suffering, and misfortune.

This is the protective scheme we are asked to let alone, because we are told the country wants relief from Congressional agitation.

AGITATION.

The insufficient, not to say deceptive, character of the late revision, the manner of making it, and the circumstances attending its adoption alike forbid that it should be permanent. When it was being forced upon the country with assumptions and assurances which have not been verified, I warned its authors it would give no contentment to the public mind and no rest from agitation, because it did not afford the relief admitted to be a measure of justice by the commission packed to perpetuate existing abuses. I said then that its authors in and out of Congress but deceived themselves if they expected from this measure so much as a temporary settlement.

In a speech made in January last at Columbus, Ohio, Hon. Columbus Delano, a protectionist, long a member of Congress and member of President Grant's Cabinet, said, substantially, that of his own personal knowledge the Tariff Commission was secured by the manufacturers whose salaried agent they caused to be made its president, and as their agent here, after his and his employers' commission had made its report (his own report), he secured many changes in it greatly to the advantage of manufacturers. I hardly need to say that a revision procured through such agencies and methods is entitled to no respect whatever.

It is correctly said that a tariff too low necessitates change to obtain needed revenue. It is equally true when too high, as ours now is, change is necessary to avoid a surplus from imports on which the duty is not prohibitory. The only security from agitation and change, therefore, is to confine the taxing power to its rightful purpose of obtaining revenue limited to the necessities of the Government. When no more revenue is needed by the Government of the people, it has attained the limit of its power to tax the people.

PROPERTY SHOULD PAY THE TAXES.

It is now nearly 8 years since I first said here:

Burdens of Government should be borne in proportion to ability to bear them. Property should pay the taxes. He who has much should pay much; he who has little should pay little; and he who has none, none.

And later—

Legislation which helps an unjust distribution of property, or an unfair division of the proceeds of labor, is a great public wrong.

And it is just because of this great public wrong that burdens are unequal which are laid upon the necessities and comforts of human existence. The First Congress, pressed by the needs of a nation grievously in debt, with an empty treasury, departed from this most just rule of equal taxation and resorted to the indirect method of obtaining revenue. This was justified at the time upon the assumption that an impost on trade was a tax in proportion to ability to pay it, because it was claimed that consumption was generally proportioned to the circumstances of individuals. This assumption has not been verified in our experience. It was in fact never true. With the then conditions and habits of our people it may be the evil effects of the plan were not apparent. Subsequent history not only shows its monstrous injustice but its baneful results. Some of these are to be found in the fact that this method of obtaining revenue so increasing the cost of living consumes all the earnings of a great majority of the people in the struggle for existence.

UNEQUAL BURDENS OF TARIFF TAXES.

Estimates based on the census statistics show that as many as 18,000,000 of our people do some work or are occupied in some business; that the average earnings of at least 16,000,000 of these do not much exceed $300 and are wholly consumed in means of daily subsistence. These, too, are the millions who in shop and field strike the blows of all production. All the accumulations of and boasted additions to our national and individual wealth go to one-tenth of those who earn it; and of these but few indeed appropriate the great mass of the savings of the people and are enriched by the profits of the labor of other men.

Like estimates will show that the few who profit most from the labor of all contribute little under this system of unequal taxation, not more than 2 per cent. of their savings, while the great mass of workers, including the dependent poor, pay the bulk of taxes, all of which is subtracted from the too scanty means of comfortable living.

This indirect method of obtaining revenue came early into use among those who had not only pledged but expended their fortunes for the right to establish commerce. Once established, they taxed it, for the best of reasons—they had nothing else to tax. They were impartial, too, in their exactions. Manufactures, as well as tea, coffee, and spices, articles produced and those not produced here, were made to contribute. Then, as now, the country's commerce was largely with England, whose king had caused the substance of the people to be eaten out. Tax-paying was not a favorite employment at that time, though the taxes on manufactures were but one-fifth of what we now pay. Light as they were, it may be they were yet lighter when it was declared, as it was, that their food and clothing, including tea, coffee, and spices, not grown here, were taxed for the encouragement and protection of manufactures, for had not our commerce been cut off by England, against whom manufactures were to be encouraged and protected?

REVENUE TARIFF—FREE TRADE.

To get away from impost taxes is to us practically impossible. Certainly I do not expect the people to abolish a revenue system to which they have been so long accustomed. I do expect to confine it to its rightful purpose and correct its abuses. Need I repeat that when the Government has taken from the people all that it needs for the cost of frugal administration, then the hand of the tax-gatherer must be staid. In such a limit to the right to lay taxes the protectionist, finding himself no longer pensioned on the industries of the country more or less prosperous than his own, will discover free trade. Ours is a very free country of very free men, both very freely taxed. In the same sense that we are free men in a free country freely taxed, we may be correctly named free-traders when we insist that the trade and commerce of the country and the necessities of comfortable living shall be freed from all taxes not essential to the Government for public uses.

INTERNAL-REVENUE.

The amount required from customs is dependent upon what may be received from internal revenue. The abolition of internal revenue means free and cheaper liquors but heavier-taxed and higher-priced sugar and other articles essential in every household. I am not called upon to defend the system, which has many abuses. Of the two systems it is the cheaper in administration, immensely cheaper in its results. The spies and informers complained of are common to both. So offensive is the impost that gentlewomen are required for its execution in part. The repeal of internal revenue means more than additional cost of living and greater privation to the poor; it means a permanent public debt which few own and many pay and which corrupts administration. The earlier statesmen described it as a moral canker and dangerous to good government.

While we cannot doubt the existence of great wrongs in the execution of internal-revenue laws, especially in the South Atlantic States, many of these may be cured. Neither is it because of these abuses of administration that the abolition of the liquor and tobacco taxes is demanded in the States far north and substantially free from these flagrant abuses of administration.

Mr. Jefferson has been summoned here as often as four times in a single day and made to bear testimony to the "infernal" character of a tax on whisky.

It was Mr. Jefferson who said:

Public debt is a moral canker from which we ought to emancipate posterity.

It was Mr. Jefferson who said:

Agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and navigation are the most thriving when left most free to individual enterprise. Protection from casual embarrassments, however, may sometimes be reasonably interposed.

It was Mr. Jefferson who said:

Foreign spirits, wines, teas, coffee, cigars, salt are articles of as innocent consumption as broadcloth and silks, and ought, like them, to pay but the average ad valorem duty of other imported comforts. All of them are ingredients in our happiness, and the government which steps out of the ranks of the ordinary articles of consumption to select and lay under disproportionate burdens a particular one, because it is a comfort, pleasing to the taste, or necessary to health, and will therefore be bought, is in that particular a tyranny.

It was Mr. Jefferson who said:

Taxes on consumption, like those on capital or income, to be just must be uniform.

It was Mr. Jefferson who said:

I do not mean to say that it may not be for the general interest to foster for a while certain infant manufactures until they are strong enough to stand against foreign rivals; but when evident that they will never do so, it is against right to make the other branches of industry support them.

It was Mr. Jefferson who said:

When it is found that France could not make sugar under 6 francs (h) a pound, was it not tyranny to restrain her citizens from importing at 1 franc (h), or would it not have been so to have laid a duty of 5 francs (h) on the imported? The permitting an exchange of industries with other nations is a direct encouragement of your own, which without that would bring you nothing for your comfort, and would of course cease to be produced.

It is a little singular that Mr. Jefferson should be so often summoned here by the friends of the bounty system to tell us so little when he knew so much. He was not made to bear witness to the moral canker and corrupting influence of a public debt, or that all industries are most thriving when left most free to individual enterprise; that taxes on consumption to be just must be uniform; that protection is only justifiable "to foster for awhile certain infant manufactures until they are strong enough to stand against foreign rivals, but when evident that they will never be so, it is against right to make the other branches of industry support them." Why was he not permitted to tell the whole truth?

Macaulay says:

> There is a certain class of men who, while they profess to hold in reverence the great names and great actions of former times, never look at them for any other purpose than in order to find in them some excuse for existing abuses. In every venerable precedent they pass by what is essential and take only what is accidental; they keep out of sight what is beneficial and hold up to public imitation all that is defective.

ABUSES, TO CONTINUE WHICH INTERNAL-REVENUE IS TO BE REPEALED.

What are some of the existing abuses for which some excuse is to be found in professed reverence for the great name and great actions of Jefferson? In the first six months under the new tariff 36,000,000 yards of woolen goods for women's and children's clothing were imported, and upon every one hundred dollars' worth (at first cost) $68.32 was paid in duty. Under the old law the duty would have been $68.74—42 cents more.

While this abuse continues to exist the grower of grain, who is compelled to find a foreign market and exchanges his product for woolen goods, must on his return give to the Government out of every hundred yards of cloth 68¾ yards for the privilege of selling the other 31¾ yards. This helps those most clamorous for internal-revenue repeal, who, or their friends, make woolen goods to sell 31¾ yards as nearly as possible at the first cost of the 100 yards imported. At the last session, while promising to reduce tariff taxes, these new disciples of Jefferson so increased them on manufactures of iron and other metals, including cotton and other machinery, that the planter who exchanges 100 bales of cotton for any of these manufactures must on his return surrender to the Government the foreign proceeds of 45 for the privilege of selling or using that received in exchange for the other 55 bales. All makers of iron products, with their especial representatives, profess reverence for the great name of Jefferson in continuance of this abuse.

Yet these are but examples of the innumerable existing abuses which it is proposed to perpetuate by the repeal of the internal revenue; for when we shall have abandoned this profitable source of revenue the lightest of our many burdens carried only by the willing, then will the protectionist claim to find reason not only to continue but even to augment the enormous bounties and exactions of the present tariff.

It is said this is a war tax and must be repealed now that the war has ended. The obligations of the war have not ended with the war itself. In the last twenty-two years we have paid nearly $800,000,000, and in the next twenty-two years we will pay not less than $1,000,000,000 for pensions. The bonded debt was never quite $2,400,000,000. It is yet more than $1,200,000,000. The cost of the war is not half paid. Internal taxes which yielded more than eight-tenths of the revenue obtained from that source have been repealed. Liquors and tobacco, which yielded less than two-tenths alone, are now made to contribute. And whatever else may be said of the system, what it takes from the people it puts in their Treasury. What under the urgencies of war was added to the weight of customs, especially that which yields bounties indirectly, remains to plague us, cut off our commerce, and prevent an exchange of our products abroad for which there is no market at home.

These additions or war-tariff rates should be repealed, because without yielding revenue they increase the taxes and burdens of the people. Until these are removed internal revenues ought not to be further reduced. Even the repeal of the tobacco tax would be unwise finance and only justifiable as a help, if need be, to the removal of tariff abuses.

UNSATISFACTORY CONDITION OF ALL INDUSTRIES.

The office of all others I am least ambitious to fill is that of alarmist or foreboder of evil to my country and its people. And certainly the report of the committee does not overstate the fact in saying "the condition of manufacturing industries is not satisfactory." Those of us who refuse to shut our eyes to facts must admit this to be true of most if not all industries.

In that referred to in the committee's report, iron and steel, it is shown that its most important division was idle one-third of the time in the year 1882 and yet produced all the iron the people could use. In the year 1883 less iron was made than in the previous year, and therefore more mills were idle. The same is true of all leading industries; they have outrun in their capacity to make goods the ability of the people to use and pay for them. Our mills, furnaces, forges, cards, and spindles more than equal the wants of our population. Shall we wait for our people to grow up with the mills, cards, and spindles? That will never be while Congress offers bounties for the products of new mills.

In the same journal of daily news you may read of manufacturers before Congress protesting against a reduction of taxes which yield them bounties, of the opening of new mills or shops, of old ones shutting down and running on part time, of a 20 per cent. horizontal cut or reduction in wages, and of manufacturers before Congress protesting against a reduction of taxes which yield them bounties, hypocritically assuming that they are protesting that wages may be maintained.

While the mills stand still and their owners divide among themselves profits eight months of the twelve, what is the laborer to do? To take, with or without the forms of law, part of the earnings of those who work the whole twelve months to pay twelve months' wages to those who are permitted to work but eight, would be dishonest. To maintain by taxation an industrial system which enforces idleness with its attendant suffering upon men willing to work is a crime. Both are impossible of long continuance consistent with the welfare of the State, for when all who are willing to work find employment their earnings but little exceed their daily subsistence. Want of employment for great masses of industrious men from any cause can not fail sooner or later to bring suffering, misfortune, and hunger, and hungry men are dangerous.

WE WANT A MARKET ABROAD FOR WHAT WE CAN NOT SELL AT HOME.

When industrial and financial misfortune came upon us in 1873 it was credited by protectionists to a depreciated currency and other relics of the war, excepting always tariff taxes. Abundant harvests here, and short crops abroad, brought us good prices for our grain in foreign markets and out of trouble in 1879. Evidently the stoppage of mills and shops, the cutting of wages, and want of employment for men willing to work, are danger signals to all industrial interests. It is not new industrial establishments we need, for we have more than are employed. It is not men to work, for many are idle; besides we have free trade in labor and a half million a year come from abroad. What we want is a market; somebody to buy abroad what we can not sell at home. Agricultural products can not relieve us, as in the financial troubles of 1873 to 1879, because the customers who then bought of us have other sources of supply in India and elsewhere in the East. These are being so developed that they can supply food in ever-increasing abundance.

If this were not so the division of labor and its growing productive power compels us to find other markets than our own for manufactures which have so outgrown the wants of our own people. Whatever else the tariff has or has not done it has taxed us out of all other markets than our own; and such was the purpose of its authors. On this subject Mr. MORRILL said while a member of the House:

> When one nation admits cotton or any raw material free of duty other nations are forced to follow the example or cease to manufacture beyond their own consumption, unless they give equal compensatory advantage upon exports.

When Mr. MORRILL and his associates, who made and who continue the present tariff, refused to admit ores, coal, wood, wool, and other raw materials free of duty, they were not ignorant of the effect of such refusal, and must have intended our people should "cease to manufacture beyond their own wants."

UNTAXED MATERIALS.

That we may manufacture beyond our own wants the policy of Mr. MORRILL and his associates must be so changed that in materials constituting so large an element of the cost of production our people must be placed on a level of fair competition with all others. It was for this purpose that in the bill as first presented by me ores, coal, and some of the cruder materials for use in manufactures were placed on the free-list. Ultimately and speedily, too, all classes would be benefited by such legislation—the manufacturers first, laborers most. Yet the proposition met no favorable response from the manufacturers themselves, or, so far as I am advised, from any member here claiming to be the especial representative of the industrial interests. Untaxed ores lie at the bottom of all real reform in the metal schedule. The tax on iron ore with interest and profits on investment goes into and increases the cost of the pig, then into the bar and the more finished product, adding the cost at every stage of production. The same is true of all the cruder materials which are used in the processes of production. Revenue must be derived from products ready for consumption if ours is to be a manufacturing nation at all commensurate with its unlimited resources or beyond the wants of its own people.

LOW TARIFF DEVELOPS COUNTRY MOST.

When this is done manufacturing industries may add something to the wealth of the nation by reason of the tribute which other nations must pay to its endless resources and the unrivaled skill and intelligence of its people.

The grand aggregate of national wealth, counted in the census at $43,300,000,000 in 1880, was but $26,460,000,000 in 1870. "Behold," exclaims the protectionist, "the results of our system which so multiplies and nearly doubles the wealth and national savings in a single decade." Further investigation will show that in the ten years from 1850 to 1860 with very low tariff taxes wealth was more than doubled, and that was the only decade in our history which doubled wealth. Protection has prevented this industry from bringing anything to the wealth of the country from abroad. Had manufacturing industry produced more that could be sold profitably abroad it might have better claim to the credit of the country's growth and development, when for its own prosperity it has been dependent upon other domestic industries.

DUTIES MUST BE REDUCED ON BOTH MATERIALS AND MANUFACTURES.

To the extent that materials are relieved from tax the articles into which they enter derive advantage over competing articles of foreign make, and the duty on such competing articles should be correspondingly reduced. Without this manufactures would be more highly protected than they now are and more rates would be prohibitory.

It may be asserted that competition would regulate all this in the public interest, but the assertion is not justified by the practices of protected interests. The fact is quite notorious that distinctive branches of manufacturing industry highly protected against foreign competition combine to maintain prices to the injury of the general public. In the larger industries such combination is more difficult, but it pervades the whole system, and for twenty-five years Congress has been a party to it. Some of the larger industries have tariff committees to advise Congress how to make laws that they may make money. Opportunities for such combinations have grown into monopoly.

The use made by the manufacturers of their advantages bestowed by Congress does not justify Congress in adding to them. To compensate them for income and other domestic war taxes estimated by the advocates of more protection at the time to be $128,000,000, they were given largely increased protective rates. They secured the removal of the $128,000,000 fifteen years ago, but adhere to the increased compensatory duties with the tenacity of men in pursuit of some honest purpose.

TARIFF TAXES DO NOT ALL GO TO THE TREASURY.

In estimating the causes of present or possible financial and industrial embarrassment the great burden of taxation must not be forgotten. Since 1865 national, State, and local taxes have exceeded $1,200,000,000, and the contributions of the people do not all reach the Treasury. This is especially true of tariff taxes imposed for protection.

It is sometimes claimed that certain taxes are more popular or less unpopular than others. An inquiry on that subject would probably disclose the fact that as a rule the tax will be most popular with each tax-payer of which he pays least and others pay most. The sum necessary for good government must be paid. When one pays less another must pay more than his fair proportion. And there is probably nothing for which a thoroughly honest man will so readily excuse himself for being dishonest about as the payment of taxes. Still they must be paid and by our own people.

The doctrine that the importer pays them for us is apparently exploded. If the foreign maker were permitted to and did sell in our market 100 tons of iron at $1,400, or $14 per ton, duty-free, the maker of iron here must sell at the same price. If a duty of $6 were imposed on the foreigner he must add it to the price and sell it for $20 if he returns with the same amount for his iron. Suppose he does not add the duty to the price, but pays it himself, sells his iron at the same price as if it paid no duty, $14, and returns with $8 per ton; how would the maker of iron here be benefited or protected? It is only because the duty goes into the cost and price of the foreign article that the domestic producer is protected.

To afford protection a duty must be a tax. To what extent customs revenue and the tax on articles of foreign make add indirectly to the annual burdens of the people through the increased cost and price of the home-made competing article is yet a matter of much speculation. Sometimes the price of the domestic article is increased to the amount of the whole duty on the foreign; sometimes to no part of it. But the duty on foreign articles whenever they are imported adds something to the price of what are made here. Two years ago I made an estimate, based on official statements taken from the census and Bureau of Statistics, which showed that in the census year the whole increase in cost of sugar to the consumer resulting from the tariff, which on sugar and molasses is largely a revenue tariff, was $48,820,418, which was so divided that the Treasury received $7.51 of revenue, while the planter received $1 of bounty.

The duty on hoop-iron was $31.66 per ton. The price of the domestic article was $14.61 more than the price of the foreign article, including cost of importation, which was an increase equal to half the duty. The Treasury received $500,986, and the manufacturer $1,414,876, or $2.82 for $1 to the Treasury. On bar-iron the average duty was $22.66 per ton; the value and price of the home product was $7.40 in excess of the cost of the imported article, including cost of importation, an increase equal to but one-third of the duty, and the manufacturer received $4,907,761 bounty; the Government, $1,641,453 in duty—$3 to manufacturer, $1 to the Government. Iron rails pay $16.68 duty. The increased cost over the foreign article was $11.33, or two-thirds of the duty. The cost of iron rails was increased by the tariff $6,114,916, of which $5,290,119 went to the manufacturer, and $824,747 to the Treasury; $6.41 for bounty to $1 for revenue. (III.)

From this statement it will appear that those who use these articles of home production pay for them at prices increased, some of them, to the extent of the whole duty; on others less than half the tax on the same goods when imported, and that under this system the annual tax-paying burdens of the people do not end with the contributions to the Treasury for public uses.

Since this statement or estimate was made the prices of the articles selected for illustration may have changed and the duty on some of them have been modified; this requires some modification of the statements, but they illustrate the principle or lack of principle by which this system confers especial advantages on its favorites.

Estimates of the cost of this system to the people resulting from the increase of prices and the cost of living have been made by many who have given great consideration to the subject, among them Professor Perry and Robert J. Walker, both of whom estimated it at much more than goes to the Treasury. Mr. Tilden, with more caution, writing of our enormous taxation, said:

It was aggravated by most unscientific and ill-adjusted methods of taxation that increased the sacrifices of the people far beyond the receipts of the Treasury.

PRICES AND COST OF LIVING INCREASED BY TARIFF.

A comparison of present prices with those of twenty or fifty years ago can not be made with entire accuracy. The make, style, and structure of fabrics are continually changing. Old things new made are given new names. In the report of the Iron and Steel Association made in May of last year, already referred to, the price of anthracite pig-iron per ton is given for 1860 at $24 per ton, for 1880 at $28; rolled bar-iron, 1860, at $60; for 1880 at $60, and iron rails, 1860, at $48, for 1880 at $49. These prices indicate that in iron there has been no decline of prices in the last twenty-five years.

Accurate comparison can not be made in textile fabrics of cotton, wool, flax, and silk; but in these goods, of some descriptions at least, prices are lower than they were twenty-five years ago, but not nearly so low as they would be but for the expense added to the cost of making them by the high rate of protective taxation.

In the statements made before the committee by the representatives of the Iron and Steel Association, protesting against the bill, they said, "If the duties are reduced the selling price of our products must be reduced;" and such were the statements made before the committee generally, thus admitting that prices are kept up by the tariff. Except when a reduction is proposed, the contrary doctrine is insisted upon; and before this debate is ended it will be insisted again and again that whatever reduction of prices has occurred in recent years results from the tariff, when the fact is they result from the ever-growing genius and aptitude of men. That goods are made at less cost year by year by reason of our bettered processes we learn in the every-day affairs of life.

Then why should restrictive legislation distribute the advantages of all human progress as applied to popular well-being among the favorites of Congressional legislation? If the same effort is required now as long ago to obtain the same comfort and good fortune, of what use to humanity is all we have learned? Only a few years ago the cost of railroad service was two or three times its present cost; their owners made great reductions voluntarily and still had great profits. By reason of the intelligent use of what has been learned in building and operating railroads further reductions were only just. Every State in the Union asserted the prerogative of the people and required railroads to carry at reasonable rates. No man's wages was reduced, neither was that subject inquired of. By reason of the same causes which enable railroads to carry cheaper, the makers of all things material for use in our mills, fields, and homes are made cheaper; and yet the Congress of the United States interposes to keep up prices and the cost of human comfort, that the people may have no benefit of what has been learned in all these years.

EXPORT OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS DOUBLE THAT MANUFACTURERS USE.

In the lower cost of transportation on land and sea is to be found one chief agency of the wondrous development which bounty-fed manufacturers credit to protection. The system, by adding to the cost of the materials for railroad construction, has increased the cost of railroad transportation at least 25 per cent. In the lower cost of carrying agricultural products they have found their only sources of profit. On more than one occasion here I have exposed the fallacy of obtaining a home market for agricultural products through protection maintained by taxing agriculture. In 1880 the agricultural product was counted in the census at $2,212,540,927. Assuming that these products were used by the people equally without regard to their occupations, those engaged and employed in manufacturing, including all mechanics, also miners, consumed of the products classed as agricultural three hundred and thirty-five million dollars' worth, while for more than double as much, or six hundred and eight-five million nine hundred and ninety-one thousand and ninety-one dollars' worth, the producers were compelled to seek a foreign market.

WAGES OF LABOR NOT HELPED BY TAXING IT.

During more than half of the last ten years wages have been as low or lower than before the adoption of the taxing policy as a pretended means of making wages higher. They are lower still when compared with the use which those who earn wages are compelled to make of them, for they must use them to obtain the means of comfortable living. Counted by what our laborers are able to accomplish and produce in quantities, and especially in values, wages here are but little more in many industries than the wages paid by our chief commercial rivals.

There is but one horizontal reduction for which our opponents are willing to legislate—the reduction of wages—and this their favorites, with or without regard to legislation, are now executing day by day with cruel regularity.

Of all the false pretenses with which protection mocks its victims the assumption that labor is helped or protected by taxing its earnings is the flimsiest. Protectionists, in common with our people, invite the surplus labor of all the world to come, untaxed, unrestricted, free, and join us on equal terms and share in the profits of the wonderful heritage this newer world affords. The captains and masters of industry, if not masters of Congress as well, take to themselves protection of a very different kind—they tax the people at home that they may have no competition from abroad.

REPUBLICAN PROTECTIONISTS CURE THE ILLS OF OVERTAXATION BY MORE TAXES—DEMOCRATIC PROTECTIONISTS BY MORE PLATFORM.

In the opinion of the minority members of the committee, representing as they do the friends of the prevailing policy, the cure for whatever of national ills exist, so far as they result from taxation, is to be found in higher-priced clothing and other articles useful in fields, mines, and homes; for that is what is meant by higher-taxed wool, fence-rods, cotton-bands, and tin-plates. Some of our friends here would cure the ills of overtaxation with a declaration of purpose, the execution of which they would carefully avoid. And here is the declaration. It is called the Ohio platform:

> We favor a tariff for revenue limited to the necessities of Government economically administered, and so adjusted in its application as to prevent unequal burdens, encourage productive industries at home, afford just compensation to labor, but not to create or foster monopolies.

A tariff for revenue limited to the necessities of the Government is demanded by this plan of relief. Is the tariff now so limited? If not, then why refuse to limit it? Who among the Representatives of the goodly people of that State who made this declaration believes it is so limited? Who among them believes the pending bill will reduce the revenue below the necessities of the Government? These are questions to which the plain people of the country want an answer. They will demand to know why tariff taxes are not removed in part if they are beyond the revenue limit. Do gentleman expect to escape responsibility because rates are not rightly adjusted? The adjustment will be the same when reduction is made, but whatever of monopoly belongs to it will be fostered by 20 per cent. less than it now is. If this platform has an honest meaning it is that the tariff shall be lowered to a revenue basis. And gentlemen but deceive themselves who expect the people will be deceived by a refusal to legislate in accordance with this declared purpose. If the protective policy is to be the continuing policy of the Government, it will be, and ought to be, intrusted to its friends, the Republican party.

ARGUMENTS FOR PROTECTION BASED ON ASSUMED DANGER OF REVENUE TARIFF.

Every argument in support of the protective policy is based on the assumption that any considerable tariff modification, especially a modification to the revenue basis, will destroy manufacturing industries, compel the abandonment of shops and mills, and force those now engaged in them into other employments. This is the old, old story. It was told of manufacturing industries in their infancy; it will be told when protection brings them to decay. Eight years ago I introduced the first bill for free quinine and providing for untaxed alcohol for use in making it. At once it was insisted that quinine-making would become a lost art among us if such a bill should pass into a law, and it did not then pass. Later on, when the story of free quinine got among the people, another placed the bill before the House, omitting the free-alcohol provision, and the bill became a law, protectionists themselves feeling obliged to vote for it. The great Philadelphia house did not go into decline, but continued its business of quinine-making successfully as the second largest quinine establishment in the world. So every legitimate industry would go on with a revenue tariff.

It is insisted that wages are so much higher here than in countries seeking our markets that revenue duties will not equalize the difference in the cost of production. Conceding the truth of what is not true, that the foreign rival must pay for the privilege of selling in our markets a sum equal to the difference in wages to enable the home producer to sell with reasonable profit, let us see if revenue rates will compensate for that difference. The census value of manufactures for 1880 was $5,369,579,191. The wages paid in making them were $947,953,795. The difference in cost of goods is said to be the difference in the cost of wages. But suppose the difference between the cost here and the cost abroad amounts to all the wages paid here, then these manufactures would cost abroad $4,421,625,396. Suppose the average rate of duty which the bill before the House leaves at 33 per cent. was reduced to 22 per cent., and at that rate this $4,421,625,396 in value of goods was imported. It would cost the importer at that rate, of 22 per cent., $972,757,587, which not only makes up for the difference in wages but exceeds all the wages paid for making all the goods.

If those who claim especial friendship for manufacturing industries will insist on their going into decay and then dying, some other apology must be found for their taking off than the removal of unnecessary taxes.

II.

March 11, 1884, Mr. MORRISON, from the Committee on Ways and Means, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Ways and Means, to which was referred so much of the President's message and accompanying documents as relates to the revenue, respectfully reports that in said message and accompanying documents the President has deemed it his duty to give to the Congress information as follows:

"To make a start in the proposed reduction of revenue from imports, the Tariff Commission had been created. In good faith it undertook the work. In its report to Congress it said: Early in its deliberations the commission became convinced that a substantial reduction of tariff duties is demanded, not by a mere indiscriminate popular clamor, but by the best conservative opinion of the country. * * * Such a reduction of the existing tariff the commission regards not only as a due recognition of public sentiment and a measure of justice to consumers, but one conducive to the general industrial prosperity, and which, though it may be temporarily inconvenient, will be ultimately beneficial to the special interests affected by such reduction. Entertaining these views, the commission has sought to present a scheme of tariff duties in which substantial reduction should be the distinguishing feature. The average reduction in rates, including that from the enlargement of the free-list and the abolition of the duties on charges and commissions, at which the commission has aimed, is not less on the average than 20 per cent., and it is the opinion of the commission that the reduction will reach 25 per cent.

"The chairman of the Senate Committee on Finance, in explanation of the bill before the Senate last year, which after various amendments became a law, estimated at $45,000,000 the reduction of the revenue which would follow the changes in the tariff proposed thereby.

"These intentions and calculations have not been verified.

"So the question still presses, what legislation is necessary to relieve the people of unnecessary taxes?"

Your committee find that in the first six months ending December 31, 1883, under act of March 3, 1883 (the new law), dutiable merchandise was imported into the United States valued at $235,898,109, on which duties were paid amounting to $96,514,136, being 40.91 per cent. on the value thereof. In the corresponding six months of the year 1882, under the old law, the value of dutiable imports amounted to $260,856,273, and the duty paid was $111,266,507, or 42.65 per cent. on the value. It thus appears that the average cost of importing goods valued at $100 was only $1.74 less under the new than under the old law.

This exhibit of reduction in rates made by act of March 3, 1883, amounting to 1.74 per cent. of the duty, is subject to an unimportant modification resulting from changes in value and other conditions, some of which increase and others reduce comparative ad valorem rates.

The nominal reduction made by the proposed bill is 20 per cent., or one-fifth of the present rates. With the Morrill tariff limitations in the bill, and the liquor and silk schedules omitted, as they are, the actual reduction on the basis of last year's imports will not exceed 15.74 per cent. on the whole importation of dutiable goods. Together the average reduction made in the Tariff Commission bill (act of March 3, 1883) and that to be made by the proposed bill do not equal the reduction "at which the commission aimed."

Wood, sawed lumber, coal, and salt are of such universal use among and so necessary to all the people that in view of the present abundant Treasury receipts it is not deemed advisable longer to obtain revenue from a tax on these articles.

The decrease in revenue as shown by the receipts under the new law other than that resulting from the nominal reduction of 1.74 per cent. results from the falling off to the value of nearly $25,000,000 of imports in the first half-year, under the new law, as compared with first half of the previous year under the old law. The reduction of revenue receipts under the bill reported is estimated at $31,000,000 on the basis of last year's imports. To the extent of that $31,000,000 the bill will "relieve the people of unnecessary taxes." To that extent taxes will be reduced directly "as a measure of justice to consumers," and indirectly in largely increased proportion.

From a statement made by the Bureau of Statistics, a copy of which is appended to this report, it appears that duties or tariff taxes were decreased on some and increased on other articles of imported goods under act of March last (the new law). While this is true, there has been no increase of the rates of wages in any, but a reduction of wages in most industries, as well in those whose competing products received more as in those that obtained less protection under the act of March last.

The condition of manufacturing industries is not satisfactory. In common with other industries, they only recovered late in 1879 from reverses or partial paralysis of five years' duration. In less than three years' after this recovery such new evidences of industrial adversity appeared that in one of the largest, best-paying, and best-paid industries, iron and steel, the calamity of four months' stoppages and idleness fell upon the workers dependent upon it, not upon the capital invested in it.

In the annual report of the American Iron and Steel Association for the year 1882, made May 1, 1883, by James M. Swank, esq., secretary of the association, he says:

"At the beginning of June nearly all the mills referred to (rolling-mills of Pittsburgh and the West) were closed by a general strike, which continued until the last of September, when work was resumed upon the scale of wages which had previously prevailed. During the strike of four months the prices of rolled iron did not advance, notwithstanding the stoppage of so many mills, a fact which clearly demonstrated that the capacity to produce this form of iron had again, as in the panic years, exceeded the demand. * * * At the same time it must be frankly admitted that our rolling-mill capacity has for some time been in advance of the consumptive wants of the country, and that the check to the overproduction of rolled iron which was afforded by the strike of 1882 was in no sense a calamity to the manufacturers."

It is believed by your committee that the condition of the iron and steel industries and of the workers in them has not much improved since 1882; that the condition of other industries is not unlike and differs only in degree from iron and steel; that the calamity of frequent-recurring industrial embarrassment and enforced idleness is inseparable from the enormities of our protective system; and that the calamities of such a system always fall upon the laboring poor.

Your committee therefore report the bill with the title above, and with the recommendation that it be passed "as a measure of partial relief to the people from unnecessary taxes, as a measure of justice to consumers," and "conducive to the general industrial prosperity."

Mr. BURLEIGH. May I ask the distinguished gentleman from Illinois a question?

Mr. MORRISON. Certainly.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I should like to ask the gentleman why he selected the year 1880 for the price of bar-iron instead of 1884?

Mr. MORRISON. Because we have no official data for any other year.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I will state to the gentleman that in 1860 the price of bar-iron was $60 per ton, while in 1884 it is but $36.

Mr. MORRISON. I took the census year and the official data.

Mr. BURLEIGH. And puddlers' wages in 1860 were $1.75 per day, while their wages now amount to $2.75. There has been a decline in iron since 1860 of 40 per cent.

Mr. MORRISON. The gentleman can make a speech in his own time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has ten minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. MILLIKEN. May I ask the gentlemen a question?

Mr. MORRISON. Certainly.

Mr. MILLIKEN. How much do you expect this bill to reduce the revenues?

Mr. MORRISON. It is estimated that the reduction of revenue will be from twenty-five to thirty millions, and the reduction of taxes double as much.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, in obedience to the suggestion of friends I am to follow the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, whose remarks, however, I do not propose to discuss in detail. The premises I shall assume and the general scope of my argument will, I think, be regarded as making a clear issue between us on the grave questions he has raised by proposing a bill providing for a general reduction of our custom duties.

I do not believe that a cheapening of goods, which involves a reduction of wages, can relieve any stagnant American industry. The evil from which we are suffering is not that goods are not cheap enough or that we can not produce them in sufficient abundance and of satisfactory quality. The truth is—and the sooner American lawmakers shall accept it as a controlling consideration the better it will be for the country—that the power of production the world over has, upon the prevailing basis of the distribution of the joint production of labor and capital, outrun the power of consumption; that all markets are overstocked; and that in every land multitudes of skilled and industrious people have, from many proximate, but secondary causes, been idle for a large portion of many recent years.

Nihilism in Russia, socialism in Germany, socialism in the western and nihilism in the eastern sections of Austria, communism in France, socialism accepted by the state within the limits of the British Islands, in the promotion of which Gladstone and Beaconsfield were for years engaged in a heated race and which will present almost every question the British Parliament will consider during the present session, are but expressions of the discontent born of indescribable suffering which the masses of the people of all transatlantic countries feel they can no longer endure. Enforced idleness, want, and misery are found in every industrial center; machinery stands idle part of every year; capital claims that it can only obtain its fair reward by further reducing the wages of labor, while the average supply of food of the laboring classes is in many parts of Europe inadequate to the development and support of the human system.

In a recent letter from Zurich, my daughter, Miss Florence Kelley, says:

> Our countryman, Dr. ——, informed us last evening that though for fifteen years he had been official physician to the poor in some of the worst wards of New York, he had never seen in America a case of pernicious anæmia—which is the shrinking and decay of the bones of a human being as the result of insufficient food during childhood and youth—a disease which when it has once attacked the system can not be eradicated by any diet that may subsequently be taken; but that "unfamiliar as this disease is at home, it is so common here that the frequent cases exposed at the clinics attract no special attention."

A GLANCE AT THE CONDITION OF BRITISH LABORERS.

Are our Democratic associates in their mad pursuit of cheap goods willing to add pernicious anæmia to the list of diseases with which our working people are already familiar?

Sir, last year I spent three months in England, "prosperous, merry, free-trade England." After the first week my increasing strength permitted me to ride or walk a little each day, and I was tempted to visit the slums of London, which I did under proper police protection. I also read or had read to me each of the daily journals, and on Saturday for thirteen consecutive weeks the articles entitled "How the poor live," which, written and illustrated by Mr. George R. Sims and Frederick Barnard, appeared in the Pictorial World.

Enlightened as I had thus been, it did not surprise me to learn that distinguished prelates of the established church had in a church congress warned those to whom they had a right to speak with authority that the condition of the poor of England, as they had found it upon personal inspection within a short distance from the palaces of the Queen and the Prince of Wales, was as bad as that of the French sans culottes in the years immediately preceding the sanguinary revolution of 1793. A dissenting clergyman, the eloquent and devoted pastor of Bloomsbury chapel, which stands but a few hundred feet from Bloomsbury Square and the solid middle-class mansions around it, said to his congregation that he had found but a short distance from the pulpit from which he spoke a family of nine, including father, mother, sons and daughters, who occupied a cellar not larger than the space marked by six of the pews his hearers occupied. "This was not," he said, "a peculiar case, but one of many thousands."

Within a week we have read, at least those of us who watch the papers for such indications of the condition of the British people, of a family found by the coroner near Westminster's grand old abbey, and in one of the most aristocratic quarters of London, in a cellar without a window, one member of which—a girl of full age—had just died, but whose flesh had been largely consumed by vermin before death had come to her relief. These are said to be familiar chapters in the lives of tens of thousands who, though able and willing to work, can find no place among the wage-earners of free-trade England, who our Democratic friends present as a national exemplar from whom they would have us accept as indisputable truths dogmas the prevalence of which in that country has produced these terrible results. Under their leadership we are to enter the race with the world for cheapness. They should remember that when Cobden and his co-workers began the agitation for free trade, Carlyle admonished them that they were entering into a race with barbarous nations for the production of the "cheap and nasty." It was he, too, that gave the political economy taught by Malthus and Ricardo the appellation of the "dismal science," because it suggested war, pestilence, and famine as beneficent agents appointed by an all-wise and loving Providence as the only agents whereby He could relieve the earth of an inevitable surplus of population. That dismal science still prevails in British schools, and consequently no animal that can be utilized is of so little value in England as an unemployed working man or woman with a reasonably good appetite for bean-cake or oat-meal porridge.

"Yes," I think I hear some of you rejoin, "you studied the poverty of London, which is, we are ready to admit, unparalleled." No; I I spent ten days, unknown to everybody but my daughter, who was my companion, in Birmingham and in visiting the manufacturing towns around that rich and beautiful city. We visited so much of the overcrowded precincts of the city itself as a lady might ride into, and in charge of a policeman I went beyond these limits. Our visits embraced Halesowen, Lye, Lye-Waste, and Cradley, where we found women making nails, trace-chains, heavy fire-bricks, and galvanizing hollow-ware.

I observe among those who do me the honor to be present my friend from Kentucky [Mr. TURNER], who comes to each succeeding Congress on the doctrine of free trace-chains, a bill to transfer which article to the free-list he never fails to introduce. The introduction of the bill does nobody any harm, and I shall continue to welcome him as long as I shall be returned and a Democrat comes from that district.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I never weary in well-doing, and I hope that after a while you will grant us that reasonable request.

Mr. KELLEY. Oh, yes; you ought to have free trace-chains, for we learned that the women who make them, if they are quick and good hands, can realize 25 cents a day. [Applause on the Republican side.] And all that they have to pay out of their weekly wage of 6*s.* is 1*s.* 6*d.* for the forge and fuel, and another 6*d.* for having the rods out of which to make the chains brought to the forge. Free trace-chains! God forbid that any Kentucky girl or woman should ever work at such unwomanly employment for such starvation wages, even though it be to furnish cheap trace-chains to my friend and his constituents. [Applause.]

I say to the gentleman as my friend Emory A. Storrs said to a party of Englishmen when at the dinner-table of a friend in London, they undertook to badger him on the subject of free trade. "Gentlemen, you do not want to provoke a discussion of that intricate subject at this social board. I will admit that free trade is best for you, at least for those of you who can afford to purchase anything; but I claim that protection is best for us. The vital difference between us is that you think more a great deal of a cheap shoe than you do of a prosperous shoemaker; while in America we think more of the welfare of the artisan than of the cheapness of his product." [Renewed applause.]

In one of the smallest and dingiest of the forges of Halesowen we found two men at work making light nails, such as girls are put to making when at 14 years of age the British law allows them to leave school and enter upon their lives of unwomanly toil. One of these men was a cripple and the other was evidently suffering from pulmonary disease. One of them by expending his force for full time could earn 3*s.* per week and the other 4*s.*, from each of which sums are deducted weekly 1*s.* for fuel and furnace rent, so that at the close of the week they had as a net result of their joint toil $1.25. In the villages I have named, all of which are appendages of Birmingham, we also saw English girls and matrons making large fire-bricks; one carrying against her breast or stomach heavy lumps of wet clay, out of which her co-worker, it may be her sister or mother, molded the immense bricks which she who had brought the clay carried to a heated space near to where she was to pick up her next load of wet clay. Why, you ask, do these girls engage in such work? The answer is a simple one; they prefer to make bricks, because they can make 6*s.*, or a dollar and a half, net per week, while their sisters who make nails or chains can not assuredly earn so much, and are, as I have said, subject to a charge of 1*s.* 6*d.* per week for fuel and rent of forge.

The chief specialties of Cradley are chains and hollow-ware. There we saw girls galvanizing stew-pans, boilers, bath-tubs, and other articles of like nature. The desperate struggle for life imposed on British toilers by cheap goods and low wages is well illustrated at Cradley. The assured receipt of $1.50 a week will tempt women from the nail or chain maker's forge to the brick-shed. The pay of a galvanizer is $1.75 per week; and for this additional shilling girls will pass the forge and the brick-shed to engage in a galvanizing room, although the strongest of them knows that in less than six months the gases generated by the process will vitally impair her health. In this connection I submit a brief extract from one of Miss Kelley's published letters.

> It is characteristic of the neighborhood of Birmingham that each village has one industry; thus nailers and chainmakers are as thoroughly separated as though their work differed radically and separation were needed. But the difference between Lye-Waste and Cradley is slight. There are the same forges, the same hovels, the same dusty roads, and the same industrious people. To tell the story of the chainmakers, who we watched at their forges, is merely to repeat the picture of Stocking Lane, and this I have no wish to do. Here and there, however, the forges are interspersed with factories and "works," and the facts as to these works illustrate some of the ills to which the nailers eagerly fly in their effort to escape from their peculiar slavery.
> In one establishment we were shown young women at work on galvanizing pails, and our guide (who had come over from Lye-Waste for our benefit) observed privately concerning them, "They'm flyin' from nailin', and they thinks it's a fine thing to get seven shillin's a week. But they gets poorly, and then they gets sick, and then their parents has to keep 'em, and they don't earn nothin' for a long time till they'm well again." This we were prepared to believe, for we found difficulty in breathing in the first room to which an intelligent foreman showed us. This was a large, dusky room, with a high ceiling, and arrangements for ventilation with which we could find no fault. But in the middle of the room stood a seething cauldron of a steaming fluid. Back of this stood a man dipping pails in the cauldron and handing them to young girls, who swiftly rolled each pail in a heap of sawdust, then deftly brushed the fluid over the metal surface, assuring an equal coating to every part. A few moments of breathing the fumes from the cauldron made our retreat to the sultry outdoor air very refreshing, and sufficed to convince us of the unwholesome nature of this work, even before we noticed long rows of carboys of vitriol which furnish one ingredient of the galvanizing fluid. "The inspection is severe," observed the foreman. "The works are closely watched, and if a girl works a half-hour overtime we're brought up roundly. It's very unwholesome work."

This brief extract will convince you that I do not speak of things of which I have merely read. No, gentlemen, I speak of incidents that I saw and of people with whom and whose employers I conversed. Sir, I do not want American goods to become so cheap that, as my distinguished friend the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. MORRISON] said, we can sell to other people. God forbid that American labor shall ever be embodied in any production that shall be cheap enough to be sold at Halesowen, Lye, Lye-Waste, Cradley, and other manufacturing villages that surround Birmingham. [Applause.]

But depressing as was the influence of each of these towns in which the employments are in this country regarded as demanding masculine muscularity, girls and women are almost the only workers, our visit to Myrthyr Tydvil and to the great Dowlais iron-works upon the hill overlooking Myrthyr was still more saddening. In the neighborhood of Birmingham, Manchester, and Bradford the school law is admirably enforced, and during school hours children between 5 and 14 years of age are not frequently seen upon the highways. In this Welsh mining and iron district the contrast in this respect was as striking as it was painful. Here it is evident that the local authorities give but little if any attention to the enforcement of the only law which protects British childhood from the cruelest exactions of British industry. Here we found boys and girls loitering listlessly at all hours of the day in the reeking admixture of clay and grime which make the sidewalks and highways. It would have been a satisfaction to see them indulging in any of the plays of joyous childhood, but in our several tours we saw no instance of this.

The factory law, however, has even here had one good effect; it has reduced the number of women employed in the Dowlais works from nearly 3,000 to about 1,000; and for this womankind throughout the civilized world may well be grateful. The Dowlais works are engaged in the production of heavy iron of all descriptions; the interior is a net-work of railroads, forges, furnaces, rolling-mills, and trip-hammers, the coarse labor in attendance upon all of which, as well as at the mouth of the coal-pit on the cars, was until quite recently the special and almost exclusive work of girls and their mothers. The number of them, as I have said, has been reduced to about 1,000, and of these we saw some loading and unloading coal-cars; others, one upon the car pitching bricks to another upon the wet, rough floor, who piled them according to orders; others were handling and carrying heavy iron plates or bars from the lifting of which I would have shrunk in my days of greatest vigor.

Having asked the privilege of speaking to any of these women when not engaged, we felt free to interrogate them as to their wages. They might not have answered me, but to one of their own sex, who addressed them in tones of sympathy, they told their stories freely; and from all of them we learned that 6s. ($1.50) was regarded as good wages for a week. I am unwilling to reduce the duties on any form of iron or steel 20 per cent., as is proposed by this bill, in order to allow my countrymen to consume the results of the labor of these British maidens, wives, and matrons. The plea that their employers, in order to sell us such cheap goods, must compel them to accept such wages is not one that satisfies my judgment, but is one from which my manhood revolts.

At Manchester we remained nearly a fortnight. It is a noble city, the management of whose municipal affairs is unequaled in the United States. To Sheffield our visit was less protracted. The houses, grounds and conservatories of the great steel-makers who so long controlled our market, to some of which we were admitted, are regal in their extent and magnificence, but the offensive surroundings of the homes of the working people and the brutal coarseness we encountered at every turn in their quarter of the city made us glad to beat an early retreat.

The American traveler finds much to admire in the best parts of Birmingham, Manchester, Sheffield, Bradford, and every other great industrial center of England, but going thence to the localities in which working people dwell he will, unless he be a tariff reformer who believes that to get his supplies cheap is the chief end of man, be shocked by the terrible contrast he beholds. In each city and town he will find long rows of small houses, between every two of which is an arched alley leading to a court, upon either side of which there are from four to six houses. These, like the front ones, are without cellars or underdrainage, have three small rooms rising one above another, each also having a house like unto itself built against its rear wall, the consequence of which is that thorough or through ventilation is impossible in any of these huddled groups of houses for workingmen and their families. The streets are the only play-ground for children, as well as drying ground for the wash of each family, whose patched and ragged garments flaunt in the breeze on lines drawn from house to house as if by common consent or express stipulation. For the use of the occupants of each court, together with those of the front buildings, there is one hydrant and one privy. In view of these hard conditions is it not too much to expect cleanliness, modesty of bearing, or chastity itself of families who are habitually huddled together in this fashion.

A house in any of the villages referred to, as small or smaller than these, of similar construction, with three rooms, the lower one a living-room, parlor, kitchen, and sitting-room, with broken-stone floor, and chambers above, which furnish sleeping accommodations to the parents, the sons and daughters, and not infrequently to the husbands and wives of the sons and daughters and their children, all of whom are thus crowded into two little sleeping-rooms.

Yet it is of these sets of three apartments, contracted, dark, undrained, and unventilated, that those apostles of falsehood, Professor Sumner, of Yale, and Perry, of Williams College, speak when they compare their rental with that of the homes of American artisans to prove the superior condition of the working people of Great Britain to that of those of the United States.

It will hardly be regarded as possible that other classes of British laborers are housed with less consideration than the facts I have presented indicate, but the London Echo of Monday, October 8, 1883, says:

The paper read by Mr. George Smith, of Coalville, before the social science congress, on Saturday, gives a lamentable account of the condition of large numbers of canal children. Mr. Smith tells us that there are close upon 30,000 of these children of school age who never enter a school. Many of the cabins in which they live are so small that a man can neither stand upright nor lie out straight on the bed on which he and his wife and his children have to lie.

FREE SHIPS.

One of the most insidious pretensions for the overthrow of our protective system is the demand for the admission of free ships and the material out of which ships may be built. Is there such a demand for ships to engage in international commerce as to justify us in abolishing the duties on pig, bar, angle, and heavy iron generally and on steel for the construction of Government and commercial vessels at the probable cost of dooming thousands of our workmen to idleness by opening our market to the free sale of British ships for which foreign capital and enterprise can find no employment? This is not a fancy sketch of the depressed condition of the British carrying trade or of the effect of such legislation upon our own coal, iron, and steel industries. This will appear to the most skeptical from the following telegram clipped from the Philadelphia Public Ledger of this morning:

DEPRESSION IN THE SHIPPING TRADE.

LONDON, April 12.—The depression in English shipping has become extreme. The ports are crowded with destitute and suffering sailors. In Shields alone there are 4,000 seamen out of employment. A hundred steamers are lying idle upon the Tyne. Ten thousand laborers in the Tyne ship-yards are out of work, and as many more in the Sunderland ship-yards. Business is slack in the yards along the Clyde, but so far there has been less suffering than in the other ship-building localities.

RAW MATERIALS.

Mr. Chairman, the persistency with which the unmeaning cry that raw material should be admitted free of duty has been maintained for years has nearly persuaded many good people that heavy duties are imposed on wide ranges of raw material which we can not produce for ourselves. Ignorant men may echo these cries as parrots chatter, but the free-trade Democracy, as represented on this floor, know better, and shout for free raw material for the purpose of deceiving the people. What article of raw material which they would make free can they name that is not and has not for years been on the free-list? The author of the original Morrison bill could find none. The free-list was to be a cardinal feature of his bill, the 20 per cent. reduction was to be less important because a less philosophic and a somewhat hap-hazard application of the doctrines of British political economy. To illustrate these doctrines scientifically an extended free-list was necessary. All this the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means understood perfectly, and that list as it appeared in the original bill embraced some twenty-five or thirty articles, among which, my friend will pardon me for saying, there was not one single specimen of unwrought material. Material that has been wrought is not raw. No one will say that broadcloth is raw material because a tailor may shape a coat therefrom. And so long as the designation raw material may properly be withheld from broadcloth so long it must be admitted that the authors of this bill were unable to find a single specimen of imported raw material that had not already been relieved of import duties. The fraudulent character of the claim that the great majority of the articles embraced in the free-list of the original bill were of the nature of raw material was so apparent, that the majority of the committee, at the instance I think of the author of the bill, withdrew all but three of them, namely, coal, lumber, and salt, every one of which is a prepared or manufactured commodity.

Is not coal raw, asks some misguided disciple of Sumner and Perry? Yes! When still in the earth and is bought and sold, as children say, unsight, unseen, coal is raw; but when thousands and oftentimes hundreds of thousands of dollars have been expended in obtaining access to it and preparing it for the purposes of manufactures and commerce; when shafts have been opened and breakers and railroads have been constructed and provided with adequate motive power and rolling-stock, and when hundreds or thousands of people have been employed in mining, manipulating, and sorting it so that while the coal shall be sent to market the slate and other impurities with which nature had intermixed it shall be left behind, it is absurd to speak of it as raw or unwrought material.

Is lumber, as described in the free-list of this bill, a raw material? No, sir! Timber in the forest is raw, and rough timber and quite a number of kinds of hewn timber are already on the free-list. Every article of wood embraced by the free-list of this bill as finally revised is material largely advanced by the expenditure upon it of money and labor. The remaining article in this wonderfully scientific free-list is salt.

Sir, instead of salt being a raw material it is a highly manufactured finished product, the raw material for the manufacture of which is brine as it wells up or is pumped from its hidden sources in the earth. The expenditure of time, fuel, and labor converts the raw material furnished by nature into the commercial article known as salt, and which is needed by mankind for so many vital purposes. Now, sir, why may not a deduction of 20 per cent. from existing duties on these highly manufactured articles, coal, lumber, and salt, do as well in the way of tariff reform as a like reduction on the duties imposed on all the manufactured articles embraced by this bill? Will some advocate of this free-list tell me the process by which he reaches the conclusion that coal delivered to the steamer at the seaboard or at the forge or factory in the remote interior of the country is a raw material? how it is that boards sawed, planed, tongued and grooved, and other forms of wood prepared for carpentering and cabinet-making are ascertained to be raw materials? and by what magical power it is that nature, without the aid of man's labor or the expenditure of his time and money, converts brine into pure, dry salt and packs it into "bags, sacks, barrels, and other packages?" It must be remembered that this Morrison bill does not propose to put brine on the free-list. Oh, no; it provides for free salt, whether in bags, sacks, barrels, or other packages, and as it also makes these coverings free, it ought to tell us on what kind of trees or vines nature hangs the ready-made bags, sacks, and barrels as so much raw material.

Sir, I deny that the free-trade wing of the Democratic party on this floor is in favor of free native raw material or will admit many forms and grades of it to use till they have paid inordinate taxes. The two materials which enter into more of our mechanical and scientific productions than any other are brimstone and alcohol. We import much of our brimstone and it has long been on the free-list; but alcohol is an American production removed but one degree from a raw material, in the production, current price of and an extended market for which our farmers have a vital interest. I speak of corn; yet, sir, with a single exception, these gentlemen who clamor so lustily for free raw material and cheap raw material have within a week proposed, voted for, and carried a resolution in favor of maintaining and requiring the payment of a tax of 90 cents on the manufactured product of every peck of corn before it can go into the market and be sold for use in the arts. Of the free-trade raw-material Democracy on this floor every man, with the single exception of my friend from New York [Mr. HEWITT] (who does me the honor to listen to me, and who after three years of controversy between us as to the possibility of using methylated spirits frankly announced to the House the other day that he was in favor of free alcohol because it was a raw material which entered into so large a number of our manufactures), is opposed to the untaxed manufacture of those important forms of raw material, corn, rye, fruit, barley, hops, and tobacco. They demand the privilege of importing free of duty an infinite variety of foreign manufactured goods under the pretense that they are raw, but insist upon taxing all forms of material our farmers can produce, including nature's great and only solvent, the rival of brimstone in the universality of its use in the arts, at the rate of 90 cents a peck upon corn, the raw material from which it is extracted by a single process of manufacture. My free-trade friends, if you are in favor of free raw material for manufactures, and wish to secure ample markets and good prices for the crops of our farmers, why do you insist upon the prepayment of a tax of $3.60 upon a bushel of corn before you permit its first manufactured yield to go into the arts in the United States? Out upon such hollow and shallow pretenses of devotion to American interests and national industries! It is the free-trade wing of the Democracy I thus denounce, for my Democratic colleagues from Pennsylvania are all in favor of removing these infamous impositions upon our home production and commerce.

Before leaving this question finally I should say that the tax we impose on his corn is but part of the wrong we do the farmer. It is a tax of more than 400 per cent., and to this extent increases the cost of every alcoholic preparation, whether of drug or perfumery, whether collodion for the production of a photograph or chloroform for benumbing the senses during the operation of the dentist or surgeon, whether the preparation by his wife of her winter's supply of liquid camphor and arnica, or whether it has gone into any of the thousand articles which he purchases for daily use without suspicion that in their cost he is paying the "whisky tax." This tax is higher than any duty known to the tariff, and falls upon almost every manufactured article the farmer purchases, and he should know that they who insist upon its maintenance are more devoted to the theories of foreign economists than they are to the practical economies of their laboring countrymen.

THE TOBACCO TAX.

What is the effect of the tobacco tax upon the interests of the farmer and the wage-earning classes generally of the country? The Speaker of the House submitted a proposition to the recent Democratic caucus for the repeal of the tobacco tax and reduction of the tax that prevents the small farmers of the South from using the raw material they grow upon their peach and apple trees. He, however, coupled with these genereous offers a proviso that such legislation would only be granted in consideration of the reduction of the duties imposed by the present tariff. With this boon to farmers he would bribe their Representatives to unite with him in prostrating the manufacturers of the country and their workmen. It is creditable to their discretion that no gentleman who figured at that caucus has yet exhibited the courage to present such a bill to Congress and the people. This resolution by its terms and in the source whence it emanated is so remarkable that the country may be incredulous as to my statement; I had therefore better present its text as I found it in the Democratic organ the morning following the caucus:

Mr. CARLISLE then offered the following resolution, which was adopted—88 to 27:

"Resolved, That in order to reconcile conflicting opinions and secure legislation reducing taxation the plan for the reduction of taxes at the present session of Congress should embrace a provision repealing all internal-revenue taxes on tobacco, snuff, and cigars, and special taxes connected therewith, and also reducing the tax on brandy distilled from fruit to 10 cents per gallon: Provided, Such repeal and reduction shall not be made except in connection with the reduction of tariff duties."

Let us look at the effect of this tobacco tax upon the earnings and possible savings of our laborers, the repeal of which can be purchased only at such fearful cost. During the last fiscal year it yielded something over $46,000,000, and the bill of March 3 last would, it was hoped, reduce the receipts from this source nearly 50 per cent. The receipts from tobacco, snuff, and cigars will therefore amount this year to about $25,000,000, every cent of which is wantonly abstracted from the producing classes of America. No foreigner has hitherto paid or is now required to pay the tobacco tax. When it is manufactured tobacco goes into a bonded warehouse, and when it is to be exported it is delivered to the carrier, released from bond, and free from tax.

Chewing is not the habit of our wealthy and more refined citizens. We rarely find a cuspidor exposed in any part of an elegant mansion, but we do find in many instances daintily wrought ash-cups and the conveniences for smoking in richly appointed libraries. The consequence is that our rich men contribute no part of the millions which we derive from the internal tax on tobacco. If they smoke or offer to their friends an American cigar it is because they have been cheated in a purchase. They pay for and desire to use imported cigars. If, therefore, they put any taxed tobacco between their lips it is because they have been cheated.

To learn who contribute the $26,000,000 to the surplus treasure of the Government this year you must go into the mines, the furnaces, the forges, and the workshops of the country, or watch the groups on a fair and pleasant evening that gather about the homes of our working people in town and city. Here you will see gathered at the homestead door parents and children, and the weary father while enjoying these hours of quiet home life is in almost every case seen to be smoking his pipe or giving other evidence that he finds comfort in indulgence in the tobacco habit. So with the sailor; as he walks his lonely watch under the stars or in the beating of the storm finds a companion whose influence is soothing in a quid of tobacco, regardless of the fact that his Government is making him pay a tax of from four to eight hundred per cent. upon its true market value.

You may reply to these economic truths by saying that tobacco is not a good thing for laboring people to use; that it is useless if it is not positively injurious to them, and should therefore be taxed. If you rest your statutory infringement of the rights of the American growers and consumers of tobacco upon this doctrine, will you not do me and those of your countrymen who are burdened by these unnecessary taxes the favor to read the clause in the Constitution which justifies you in mulcting with pecuniary penalties those who find comfort in its use, as do the miner, the sailor, and the millions of those employed in every department of labor within the broad limits of our country from whom you will this year abstract $26,000,000?

Before these taxes were imposed the workingman in any Northern city or town could for 1 cent buy four cigars made of better tobacco than he now buys for use in his pipe; but now the tax on each cigar is more than the price was or would be again for the grade of cigars of which I speak if the tax was repealed. To remove the tax on tobacco would be to remit to the industrial classes of this country from twenty to twenty-five millions of dollars a year, and the responsibility for not doing it, as well as for maintaining the tax on alcohol, which goes into the arts, rests with that party which has a majority of seventy in this House.

TAUGHT BY EXPERIENCE.

The producing classes of England are at last realizing how great a burden upon them is the excise or internal-tax system. Many of them are confused by the fact that the government ingeniously speaks of an internal tax as an excise duty, and as yet fail to see the vital contrast in the effect of a burdensome tax and a protective duty; but experience is very rapidly enlightening them on this point. Here is a curious illustration of the fact I assert, the report of which I clipped from the London Standard of April 4, 1883, on which day it appeared as current news in all the leading journals. Gentlemen will observe that the chancellor of the exchequer, in closing his interview with a deputation of the silver trade in London, said:

There was no doubt, having himself gone over Tiffany's and the other large shops in New York, that the development of the silver trade in the States was due to their fiscal policy.

This admission by the British chancellor of the exchequer is a severe reflection upon the course now being pursued by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and his followers in striving to reverse the fiscal policy to which our manufacturing supremacy is due. But here is the article itself:

A deputation of the representatives of the silver trade in London waited yesterday on the chancellor of the exchequer in respect to the silver duties. The deputation was introduced by Sir George Campbell, M. P. Mr. E. J. Watherston and Mr. Johnson laid the views of the deputation before the chancellor of the exchequer, strongly urging the abolition of the duties on silver, as tending to cripple the trade far in excess of any value to the revenue likely to accrue. Another member of the deputation urged upon Mr. Childers the desirability, if the revenue did not permit of the reduction, to replace the silver duties by a 10 per cent. duty on imported watches and clocks, which would exactly make up the deficiency and at the same time benefit the interests of workingmen.

Mr. Childers in reply said it was scarcely the time to come before Parliament to ask for the remission of so important a sum, exceeding £100,000 In reference to the plea that the present duty of 1s. 6d. per ounce restricted trade it was a fact that of late silver had fallen in price 1s. per ounce, and yet the sales had decreased. With regard to the proposal to place a duty on watches and clocks he asked if that was not protection, and did the member of the deputation seriously ask him to adopt that policy?

The MEMBER. We would if we thought there was any chance of getting you to do so.

Mr. Childers said there was no doubt, having himself gone over Tiffany's and the other large shops in New York, that the development of the silver trade in the States was due to their fiscal policy. But he questioned the feasibility of giving effect to the proposals, though he promised to give the subject his thorough consideration.

The admission of the superiority of our financial system from such a source is a noteworthy fact, but the demand by so influential a deputation for the repeal of internal taxes and the substitution therefor of protective duties is a fact of such common occurrence as to deprive the rest of the article of a title to special notice.

Mr. Chairman, the working people and the tax-payers of England are no longer exulting over the prosperity they derive from free trade. They are convinced that a financial system which burdens its labor, capital, and enterprise with internal taxes while subjecting them to free competition with the productions of the most inadequately paid labor of the world is false and destructive. Here [holding up a package of pamphlets] are a few protectionist pamphlets. They are from British workingmen, manufacturers, ship-owners, members of Parliament, barons, earls, and dukes. The Earl of Dunraven is a leading man in the movement, and from one of his latest speeches, which came to me but last evening in the Iron Age of the 10th instant, I propose to show you some of the effects of low duties and low wages upon what was the foremost nations of the world when little more than forty years ago she insanely embraced the dismal science and engaged in the race for the cheap and nasty.

I find the speech in the report of a fair-trade demonstration at Birmingham. The proceedings were published largely in the press not only of Birmingham, Manchester, Sheffield, and other manufacturing towns, but of London. The Earl of Dunraven is president of the Fair-Trade Association of Great Britain. In the course of his remarks at the Birmingham demonstration he said:

It was claimed that England has benefited greatly by free trade. The great strides she made after the abolition of the corn laws are all attributed to the change in our fiscal system. That was partially but by no means altogether true. There were a great many other causes at work besides free trade. Free trade was of great benefit to us at one time, for the simple reason that we had the monopoly of the world's markets.

The people of the United States have not a monopoly of the world's markets, and therefore free trade can not be of the same benefit to them that it was to those who had that monopoly.

Other nations had no means of supplying themselves with goods. They had to buy from us, and consequently as our market was assured, as there was no difficulty in selling, it was an immense benefit to us to be able to buy everything as cheaply as possible. But since then things have altered very materially. Foreign nations have not only learned to supply themselves, but they are beginning to supply others. Although it is true that England made great strides under free trade, it is equally true that other nations have made as great, or even greater, strides under protection. The United States had increased £165,000,000 in accumulated wealth, France £75,000,000, and Great Britain £65,000,000. In percentage of trade increases Great Britain was only 21 per cent., while the United States was 67 per cent. In fact England was the last of the nations, instead of the first, as she ought to be.

Gentlemen will please notice that this statement is no "wandering Yankee's lie," but the statement of the Earl of Dunraven when surrounded by manufacturers and other influential personages from every part of England. Let me just here invite attention to a vital fact. In the race for cheapness manufacturers leave well fed countries and find their way to those in which labor is most depressed, and whose people, therefore, work for the smallest modicum of food and clothing; we find confirmation of this fact in a speech made by Mr. Robert P. Porter, late secretary of our Tariff Commission, at a fair-trade congress at Leamington, England, November 10, 1883. It may be well for me to say in passing that by the cry of fair trade is meant the repeal of internal taxes and the imposition of such duties on imports as will give British labor at least an equal chance with that of foreigners in British markets. It is a protest against free trade as advocated by our Democracy. In the course of his admirable address Mr. Porter said:

In France and Germany the industrial progress during the last ten years has been more marked than in Great Britain. The most dangerous of England's continental competitors in the textile industries may be found at Lille, Roubaix, Tourcoing, Rouen, and St. Etienne, in France; and Crefeld, Aachen, and Chemnitz, in Germany. The Rhenish and Westphalian coal and iron districts, with such works as those of Essen and Dortmund, and those at Seraing, Belgium, can produce iron and steel as cheaply as England can, and the certainty of a home market gives these protective countries the advantage in the contest for foreign trade. In view of this you will not be surprised when I tell you that I have found shoddy manufactures from Batley and Dewsbury established in Aachen, Prussia; Lancashire and Scottish spinners in Rouen; Leicestershire hosiery manufacturers in Saxony; Yorkshire wool-combing establishments in Rheims; Dundee jute mills in Dunkirk; all-wool-stuff manufacturers in the vicinity of Roubaix; English iron and steel mills in Belgium, and English woolen mills in Holland. I conversed with some of the gentlemen owning or superintending these mills, and was told that they could manufacture cheaper in these protective countries than in free-trade England. Removing their capital to the continent has secured a profitable home market, while England was near with widely open ports to serve as a "dumping ground" to unload surplus goods made by foreign labor superintended by English skill. In this way the English markets are swamped and the laborer undersold.

CONTRACTING OUR INDUSTTIES.

Mr. Chairman, by the reduction of duties that were not excessive and the total repeal of others we have begun the dangerous work of expelling manufacture hitherto well established in our midst. When the Forty-seventh Congress assembled it was my hope and that of my protectionist associates, and I think it was also the hope of the really conservative men of the country, that while there might be reduction of duties in some instances, there were others in which by departmental or judicial decision or Congressional action duties under which industries had grown up had been fatally reduced, which might now be restored. In this hope we were disappointed; a vigilant minority proved in many instances capable of not only preventing restoration of just duties, but in alliance with a few Republican malcontents were able to reduce others below the protective standard. This action, together with that of the Forty-sixth Congress, in putting quinine on the free-list effected the banishment of several branches of industry which are of national importance, if not essential to national independence.

For many years we manufactured the best and purest quinine and cinchonidia that were produced anywhere; their character and quality were unquestioned. But two establishments in the world assumed to compete with us in these respects—the Howards of England and Pelletier of France. The tax of 90 cents a peck on corn when manufactured imposed a duty of $1.80 per gallon on the solvent vital to the manufacture of these drugs, but it could be paid because a protective duty countervailed this otherwise destructive influence; but by a united Democratic vote, aided by a few misguided but professed protectionists, quinine, cinchonidia and all other salts of quinia have been put upon the free-list. The gentlemen on that side of the House who engineered and accomplished this work tell the country that they are for a revenue tariff; they even tell us in the face of what we have seen them do in this very matter that they are for a revenue tariff.

Let us test their sincerity by this action of theirs. To in part countervail the tax on alcohol, cinchona bark had been put on the free-list, and when quinine and cinchonidia were also put there, what revenue from these drugs had these revenue-tariff men left the Government? To this extent, at least, their demand for a revenue tariff is like their protestations in favor of free raw material—hollow and insincere.

What has been the result of this absurd legislation? Why, Mr. Weightman, the surviving member of the firm of Powers & Weightman, determining not to be driven from a business to which he had devoted the best years of his life, sent a competent agent to Europe to establish a manufactory of quinine and cinchonidia where wages were low. Within six weeks he has purchased the largest establishment of the kind in Germany, and having shipped his stock of raw and partially manufactured materials and his retorts and other implements, has also sent that brilliant chemist and scientist Dr. John Weightman to superintend the manufacture by German laborers of quinine, cinchonidia, and other salts for his old customers and those of his old home competitors. With German wages and free alcohol he can undersell all American competitors, and thus monopolize the American market, as well as secure a good share if not all the money the Government used to receive from the duty on quinine and other salts of quinia. By thus banishing one house we have closed all the others and made the United States the dumping-ground for the cheap and adulterated quinine of all irresponsible continental manufacturers.

The argument with Mr. Weightman is that if the United States prohibit him by law from following his business here he will pursue it elsewhere, and if he thus makes apparent to his countrymen the necessary results of such absurd legislation, he may do some good to the future industries of the country he loves and which is so gifted with raw material. Thus did anti-protective legislation banish one vital industry and deprive a few hundred American laborers of employment. But we have recently perpetrated graver follies of the same kind.

The Republican party had put a duty of $2\frac{2}{10}$ cents per pound on tin plates, under which duty the manufacture of such plates was successfully established at more than one point, when the Treasury Department succeeded by some means in permitting itself to be persuaded that a comma, which if removed to another clause would reduce the duty to 1 1-10 cents per pound, was out of place. It thereupon, instead of referring the question to Congress who had put the comma there, ordered the suggested change to be made and thus ruined the proprietors of the young establishments who were just organizing a prosperous business and perpetuated our dependence on Great Britian for the $20,000,000 worth of tin plates we consume per annum. So, too, a decision of the Treasury first, and Congressional action subsequently confirming it, reduced the duty on cotton-ties and hoop-iron cut to lengths, and left the American market at the mercy of foreign manufacturers, because no establishment in the country could pay American wages for the manufacture of these articles and compete with the starvation wages of England.

In the last revision of the tariff there was a special provision that where one or more rates of duties were made applicable to the same article the highest rate should be applied by the Treasury. This was the case as to iron and steel wire rods, to which in construing different parts of the bill it was found three rates were applicable. To solve this difficulty the Department practically ruled that Congress meant lowest when it said highest, and declared the lowest duty, six-tenths of 1 per cent., to be that which must be collected. Thus was banished from the country the manufacture of iron and steel wire rods; and I am informed by my friend from New York [Mr. HEWITT], whose authority on this point no Democrat will dispute, that he and all other American manufacturers of wire rods, which was a large and very important branch of the iron trade, are now unable to manufacture rods in competition with the low prices prevailing in Europe, and have had to abandon the manufacture of rods and import their entire supply.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Let me interrupt the gentleman to say that it was your tariff that did it, and not a Democratic tariff.

Mr. KELLEY. I am not discussing the question whether the tariff enacted last session was adopted by Republicans or Democrats, but can truly say that if 20 per cent. of the Democrats in each House had united with the Republicans we would have put through a tariff which would have prevented the destruction of the gentleman's business and allowed his firm to make its wire-rods in this country and by the aid of American workmen.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Would you have allowed me to fix things on the conference committee.

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, sir. But no Democrat would accept a place on that committee save Mr. CARLISLE, who, by common consent of his partisan friends, did so that he might report what was done by the committee. Senator after Senator declined to serve, and we waited nearly a day just at the close of the session in the hope of getting Democrats to come in and aid in perfecting the complex details of the bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Then the whole performance was a Republican performance, according to the gentleman's own statement, and they are wholly responsible for the result.

Mr. KELLEY. No. Democrats like you shirked it; and the Republicans who sat on the conference committee had to deal with the material sent it. The effort was to defeat the bill by delay, and thus Democratic tactics made it primarily necessary to deal summarily with many parts of the bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Allow me to state that Democrats like myself were not here.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman palters with the question, and will, if permitted, consume my time as that of the committee of conference was so nearly consumed by Democratic delays. I must therefore proceed by asking the gentleman from New York or any of his Democratic associates to tell me whether it is the Republicans of the House who are here and now proposing to further reduce the duty on wire rods 20 per cent.? Who voted to consider the proposition to-day, the Democrats or the Republicans? The gentleman talks about and endeavors to confuse what occurred a year ago; but I propose to go back but two hours, so that the day's Journal can tell the most oblivious of us what he has just done. [Laughter.] There will be no question of veracity between us on a journalized fact not two hours old.

A MANUFCTURING NATION WITHOUT WORKSHOPS.

Having shown that the British ship-building interest is much depressed, and that British sailors and ship-owners are suffering greatly by the depression of the carrying trade, let me now proceed to furnish proof of the proposition that if the nations of the world are to compete simply for cheapness of production, and if cheap commodities for consumers is the chief end of man and the highest object of government, general production must be transferred to those countries in which the laboring classes can keep soul and body together on the least amount and cheapest character of food. It was in support of this theory that I invited your attention to the fact that British capitalists whose lives have been devoted to the production of leading British fabrics and wares have carried their capital and skill to foreign countries in which, by the aid of lower wages, they can manufacture more cheaply, and after supplying the country to which they have gone, can dump their surplus goods free of duty into merry, old, free-trade England, the predominant characteristic of which is coming to be the prevalence of misery and starvation.

The rapidity with which the burden of excise duties or internal taxes, the weight of which is not offset by countervailing protective duties, is verifying the prediction made by Sir Edward Sullivan about fifteen years ago, that under this policy England would soon become a manufacturing nation without any workshops, would long since have awakened to a sense of danger a people who were less enslaved by fetich worship than are the political economists of Great Britain. Here is the Manchester Examiner of March 27 telling us of the closing and destruction of Messrs. Jackson's textile mills at Blackburn. It is not so suggested, but it is nevertheless quite within the range of possibilities that the Messrs. Jacksons will transfer their mill to India, where wages are lower and production cheaper than in any country of Europe.

In consequence of bad trade and their inability to effect an insurance on the older portion of their mills in George street west and neighborhood, Blackburn, the firm of Messrs. R. R. Jackson & Co. have given orders for the whole concern to be closed, and both in the spinning and weaving departments the hands are working up the material on hand. It is expected that they will all have finished within three weeks. The old mill and the new mill, containing 71,000 spindles, are to be razed to the ground, and the material sold. Phœnix Mill, which has been only recently rebuilt after a fire, is to have its looms taken out and sold, and then sold as a spinning mill, containing 18,000 spindles. In the two first-named mills the whole machinery is new and on the throstle principle. The three weaving sheds, containing respectively 733, 365, and 185 looms, are to be let, either separately or together, as going concerns if possible. Messrs. Jackson pay over £1,000 weekly in wages, having in their various mills, which form one great block, 89,000 spindles and 1,500 looms. The whole of the buildings to the west of the watch-house are to be pulled down, and these are the most extensive portions of the premises.

INDIA'S WRONGS AND BRITAIN'S PUNISHMENT.

Mr. Chairman, the story of the recent industrial progress of India is in my judgment more interesting so far as economic questions are concerned than that of any other people. No measure that promised to prevent the diversification and restrict the quantity of Indian manufactures to which their powers might be extended has been omitted by either the British or the Anglo-Indian Government. For many years the Indian tariff imposed a duty of from 3 to 5 per cent. on cotton goods imported into that country and admitted raw cotton duty free. To these provisions Lancashire uttered no objection so long as she enjoyed a practical monopoly of the Indian market. But 10 cents a day is liberal pay for an Indian weaver or spinner, and in the race for cheapness India was beating Lancashire; this if it could prevent it the British Government must not permit. The viceroy, doubtless under instructions from the home government, submitted to his council a proposition for the repeal of the duty on imported cotton goods. The council, pointing to the revenue the duty yielded, £1,000,000 annually, reminded the viceroy that this large sum had failed to prevent a deficiency in the budget, and voted against the proposition. The council was powerless, and the viceroy by an arbitrary edict abolished the duty.

This, however, was not enough to satisfy rapacious Lancashire. Low wages compensated for the loss of duty, and the number of Indian mills continued to increase. This sign of prosperity among pagan subjects the Christian Government of Great Britain could not tolerate so long as there was a hope of its defeat. How could that be accomplished? Lancashire was quick to suggest means. The short-staple cotton of India can not be worked successfully without an admixture of long-staple foreign cotton, which had always been admitted free of duty, but this should now be subjected to a tax; and, against the protest of every chamber of commerce in India, in 1875 a tax of 5 per cent. was imposed on all raw cotton which should thereafter be imported into the country. No violation of the laws of British political economy could be more flagrant than this.

The Calcutta Englishman of August 5, 1875, said:

If the details given in the telegram which we publish this morning are correct the new tariff bill is about as infamous a measure as ever a subservient legislature sought to impose upon a voiceless people. An import duty on raw material is under any circumstances one of the worst modes of raising the revenue that can be devised. But the duty which the Government is about to impose on a particular quality of raw cotton imported into this country is nicely calculated to produce the greatest amount of injury that could possibly be inflicted by such an impost. The present viceroy is too acute an economist not to know what the effect of such a measure must be, and it is impossible to resist the conviction that it is for the sake of the injury it will inflict on India that the measure is proposed.

He who wishes to read the details of this infamous procedure will find it condensed into a few pages of David Syme's Industrial Science.

But—terrible experience for Lancashire!—the result of this inhuman action of the British Government of India has proven that Indian laborers, whose food is exclusively rice, can live for less than 10 cents a day. Let me reserve the district of Orissa from this statement. It is an agricultural district, from the rivers of which the people take fish sufficient for winter food. Upon the salt to preserve the fish there is imposed a direct tax of 500 per cent. Ten cents a day will not always support a laborer in Orissa; for within the memory of my friend the 500 per cent. tax on salt has twice doomed the people of the district to permit their whole catch of fish to rot and the province of Orissa to the loss of a million of its people by famine.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CHACE. I move that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania being extended? The Chair hears none.

Mr. KELLEY. With thanks to the committee, I proceed to bring to its attention a body of facts which, while they confirm the theory I am supporting, also prove that a just God is enabling the poor, persecuted, hunted, and starved millions of British Indians to punish their oppressors by crowding English productions out, not only of the Indian market but out of Oriental markets generally, by means of the cheapness at which their oppressors have compelled them to work.

Prominent among the manufacturers and warehousemen of Manchester is Mr. Robert Barclay. He is a frequent contributor to the press when economic questions are under consideration. His latest pamphlet, entitled "Foreign competition and the silver question," furnishes the following impressive facts:

There is little direct data obtainable showing the displacement of British manufactures in India itself by the Bombay mills. The Calcutta import-list, however, giving imports from other Indian ports, shows an increase in yarns (presumably from Bombay) of from 8,814 bales in 1879 to 15,899 bales in 1882. Other articles, such as T cloths, under this head also show a rapid increase; but re-exports may be included, and I do not give the figures. As negative evidence, however, the stationary, or rather the declining, figures of the imports from England, as shown in the Indian statistics, which give more full details than our own board of trade returns, are very suggestive. They are as follows for the last three years:

| | April 1 to March 31— | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| | 1880-'81. | 1881-'82. | 1882-'83. |

As regards the increase of exports from India the following figures speak for themselves:

The following particulars, also taken from a Chinese newspaper in March last, show the Bombay yarns were cutting out English yarns at the port of Hong-Kong, Bombay yarns having increased from 3,000 bales in 1875 to 75,000 bales in 1882, while English yarns had decreased during the same period from 16,000 bales to 11,000 bales.

Mr. Barclay in this instance confined his investigations to the cotton textile trade, with which his interests are so largely identified, and his facts are certainly very suggestive. They are, however, more than confirmed by the Economist, the highest financial and economic authority in England. In the issue of that paper of the 29th of last September, under the title of "Some features of the Indian trade," is an elaborate notice of the annual review of the foreign trade by Mr. J. E. O'Connor, the assistant secretary to the department of finance and commerce, from which review I make the following brief extracts:

The bulk of the Indian trade is with this country, but of late years we have not been securing so large a proportion of the business as we formerly did. In the five years ending March, 1877, the proportion of the trade with the United Kingdom to the whole trade of India averaged 60.72 per cent.; for the following five years the average was 56.53 per cent., while last year it was 55.31 per cent.

* * * * * * *

Although, however, this is still the day of small things so far as Indian manufactures are concerned, these are making considerable progress. Here is the record of the growth of the cotton weaving and spinning during the past four years:

| | Year ending March— | |
| | 1883. | 1878. |
| Number of mills | 62 | 53 |
| Number of looms | 14,882 | 10,533 |
| Number of spindles | 1,583,782 | 1,289,760 |
| Number of persons employed | 52,763 | Not stated. |

Now, moreover, a new cotton-mill is about to be established at Bangalore another at Bodnera, in Berar, and eight more at Bombay, and it is therefore, Mr. O'Conor thinks, to be expected that at the end of this year there will be at least seventy-two mills at work in India, with about 19,000 looms and little less than one and three-quarter million spindles, and employing about 58,000 operatives. Now, also, the mills in the north of India are competing with us in the supply of woolen goods of the coarser qualities. In the manufacture of jute goods also an increasing business is being done, the number of gunny bags exported last year being 60,738,000, as compared with 42,073,000 in the previous year, there being also a very large increase in the exports of gunny cloths. So prosperous, indeed, is this branch of manufacture that several mills are being extended and new ones erected, and it is expected that 1,500 additional looms will be in operation next year. Then the bootmaking industry, Mr. O'Conor reports, has taken a large development; though as yet it does not interfere with the import trade, as it is confined to a cheaper class of goods. Of beer, the Indian breweries produced last year 2,514,000 gallons, of which the Government took 1,700,000 gallons for the supply of the army, and now the Indian is supplanting to a considerable extent the English beer. And as to other industries, Mr. O'Conor writes that "the output of coal is increasing, and new fields of great capacity and good quality are being opened out; that the manufacture of iron is being carried on, and there is some prospect of its being taken up and carried out on a large scale, with that of steel, by English capitalists; that the manufacture of paper has taken a new and good departure; while that of leather has largely developed, and that in various other directions India is beginning to supply her own wants."

TEH WHEAT MARKET.

These papers refer only to the interference of India's cheaper goods with the markets of England; but here is matter of interest to American wheat-growers. It is a paragraph from the Railway News, which was copied into the Manchester Examiner and Times for March 27, 1884:

Referring to the great development of wheat exports from India since 1879, the Railway News says in 1879 the wheat exported from India was 1,044,000 hundredweights, of the value of £514,000, while in 1882 the exports increased to 19,863,000 hundredweights, and their value to £8,604,080. In the current year this quantity will proably be largely exceeded. It is a significant fact, and one which should not be lost sight of in estimating the value of railway enterprise in India, that, concurrently with a scale of rates regarded in some quarters as ruinous and disastrous, the East Indian Railway is now paying 8 per cent. upon its capital—largely increased as it was by the bonus paid to the shareholders on the state exercising its right of purchase—of £38,000,000.

This paragraph, Mr. Chairman, tempts me to recur to my opening remark, and ask our wheat-growers whether it may not be true not only of manufactures but of their special agricultural industry that the power of production has outrun the capacity of the people to consume. To settle this question properly in their own minds they must not only consider our own undeveloped capacity and that of the Saskatchewan Valley and other wheat-fields of the new Northwest, but that of India, and far more potential for evil to us than India, the great wheat-growing prairies of Southern Russia. The rapidly declining price of wheat and the reduced export demand for it indicates the possibility of what political economists call a glut in the market, but which, in nine cases out of ten, philosophic inquiry proves to be a want of ability on the part of the people to purchase the amount of commodities they usually consume. The market may be overstocked with a particular article, but can not be glutted with everything that man wants while great masses of people suffer from the lack of ability to supply their least expensive wants. The future of the wheat market may in my judgment be discussed as an exceptional article with which the world's markets may be overstocked while the ruling rates of wages prevail.

The abandonment of the protective system even to the destruction of particular manufacturing industries by which we have already excluded the manufacture of quinine, tin plates, wire rods, cotton-ties, and hoop-iron cut to lengths, which latter articles consume hundreds of thousands of tons of raw iron annually, has wrought two evil effects upon the American farmers' interests.

American laborers and their families feed on American grain and provisions, but the Germans, who are henceforth to manufacture our quinine, and the laborers of whatever continental country who are to produce our supply of cotton-ties, hoop-iron cut to length, wire rods, and tin plates, together with the hundreds of thousands of tons of iron they will consume annually will be provided with cheaper food from other lands.

This is one effect of even partial free trade upon the interests of farmers. The other is that the men we have banished from the mine, furnace, and factory find their way to fresh farms to increase the production of wheat of which the supply is already superabundant. The primary want of the American farmer is a quick and remunerative home market. When our mills, forges, furnaces, and factories were busy and our operatives were well paid we consumed nine-tenths of all the cereals we could grow, but with idleness prevailing in industrial centers, with the reduction of wages and the power to consume, and with great branches of industry expelled from the country, we can not look to an increase in the home demand or the maintenance of past prices.

I have said that our wheat-growers are in more danger from Russia than from India, and this is true. Southern Russia is one immense body of prairie land, as fertile as and in all respects resembling the rich wheat fields of Illinois. The aggregate of Russia's production of wheat for export has hitherto been limited by the want of agricultural machinery, railroads leading to available seaports, and a system of elevators. When these improvements shall be introduced in connection with the little better than Indian wages that are paid to Russian peasants, the foreign market for grain produced on our high-priced land, and at from one to two thousand miles from ports of shipment, will not pay the cost of production and transportation.

But it will be asked, is there danger of the establishment of such means of competition? In reply to this question I beg leave to tell gentlemen that the Russian Government has been and is again in negotiation with American parties to establish in the heart of this great wheat-growing country factories for the production of agricultural implements, to undertake the construction of railroads over the level surface of this prairie land, and of systems of elevators at convenient points along the railroads and in the shipping ports to which they will lead. I am no prophet of evil, no Cassandra, and have not risen to say to our farmers that this overwhelming competition is their inevitable and immediate fate; my mission is now, as it has been for all the years of my mature life, to avert, if wise counsels can do it, such disaster to any portion of the American people. Observation and the privilege of many years of intimate intercourse with Henry C. Carey have taught me that identity of interests among the people of a great country abundantly supplied with multifarious native material is created and maintained by the diversification of employments; that when manufactures prosper the farmer finds a ready market for his productions, from the smallest that reward the care of his wife or children to the great crops, such as corn; wheat, cotton, and tobacco; and that his prosperity reacts upon his countrymen who are engaged in producing wares and fabrics for his use. The highest degree of general prosperity is only attained by the promotion by each class of the prosperity of all other classes.

If he will accept and apply broad truths like these the American farmer is in no danger of a glut in the market for the growth of his fields; he, too, can diversify his productions, and in doing so can secure the market afforded by more than 55,000,000 of energetic people, among whom pernicious anæmia and kindred diseases are unknown—the market of 55,000,000 of people who, unlike the ryot of India who raises wheat but lives on rice and knows not the taste of animal food, eat meat daily, make daily use of tea and coffee, and are free consumers of sugar. Yes; and herein the wheat-grower may find a cure for his apprehension. For sugar alone we now pay to foreigners more than $100,000,000 a year, every dollar of which will in a few years, if our farmers be but true to themselves, go into their pockets, together with those of the proprietors of corn and sorghum mills and sugar refineries, around which industrial villages will cluster in every part of our farming land on which Indian corn will ripen. In making this assertion I am not drawing upon imagination. That clear, crystallized sugar can be profitably produced in merchantable quantities from corn is demonstrated beyond a doubt; and that corn sugar is a much less profitable growth and manufacture than is sugar from sorghum is also a fact demonstrated and established beyond all peradventure.

Our farmers, therefore, need not fear the competition of low wages in the wheat fields of India and Russia. Wheat-culture exhausts the soil. The wheat we export beyond the sea carries with it the vital principles of the farm on which it was raised, which does not return to enrich the producers' acres as it does when consumed in industrial villages or large cities near to where it was grown. With sugar-yielding plants it is otherwise; they are green plants, and give to the soil the nutriment they absorb from the atmosphere. Wherever corn will ripen sorghum can be produced in perfection, and the value of the seed of this plant alone is found to be equal to the cost of growing and housing the entire crop. Not only does this seed furnish nutriment to swine and horned cattle, but historians and travelers give us abundant assurance that in the past more people have lived on sorghum seed than have been sustained by wheat. Myriads of the people of the interior of Africa and Asia, from which dark regions we are but now receiving supplies of richer varieties of the sorghum plant than we have yet grown, have for centuries found in its seed food-supply equal to that the Caucasian races have found in wheat.

It is, however, not from the seed, but the stock of the plant that sirup and sugar are extracted, and this is not taken until fodder, as efficient and adequate in supply as is yielded by corn, has been stripped from it, and after having yielded its luscious juice, the stock leaves a residuum or bagasse rich in value as material from which to manufacture paper or, when properly dried, as fuel for culinary or other purposes. In sober truth it may be said that there is no industry practiced by our farmers on a large scale east of that greater Sicily, our marvelously endowed California, which gives the farmer such returns as may be earned by him who will devote his acres, under his own intelligent supervision, to the production of sorghum for a neighboring sugar-mill; but if the farmer wishes to maintain the value of his acres, his implements, and his labor he must not run mad in pursuit of the cheap and nasty or hope for bright and happy days for his posterity by inflicting the dogmas of the dismal science upon the manufacturing laborers of his country. Let him above all things require his Representative to stand by the duties which protect those of his countrymen who are already engaged in the production of sugar and sirup, whether from cane, corn, or sorghum.

Thus may the wheat-grower avert the dangers which threaten his interests. But what is to be done to protect our artisans and laborers from degradation such as the American traveler finds in foreign lands—degradation which is threatening the peace of every transatlantic country and the edicts of whose secret societies, whether of nihilist, socialist, communist, land-leaguers, or what not, are the premonitory mutterings of a convulsion which in its violence will probably exceed that of "'93," and which good men may hope will put the future on a nearer foundation of justice to humanity than any human government now illustrates? How, I ask again, shall we protect and defend the homes, the wives, and the children of our laborers from such degradation as the same class suffer in other lands? How secure such rewards to labor as will sustain our public schools and provide reasonable education for all our children; how protect American women from being degraded as I have seen women in Austria, Germany, Switzerland, the Netherlands, France, England, and Scotland, into beasts of burden in the field and laborers at merely nominal wages in attendance upon men who do skilled work in the construction of great buildings, in forges, founderies, rolling-mills, glass-works, and coal, iron, or other mines? If our Republic is to live, the wives of our men and the mothers of our children must be protected at whatever cost of economic abstractions against such degradation as this. [Applause.] One step in this direction should be taken at once. We should forthwith prohibit the importation of cheap labor, and send back to whatever country they have been shipped from men or women who have signed contracts in foreign lands or on shipboard to work at lower than prevailing American wages. [Renewed applause.] This measure, though an important one, is but a palliative in a matter in which radical and enduring relief is demanded.

Having pondered the question during the watches of many a night and sought counsel from the best thinkers to whose voices or volumes I have had access, I can point to but two means by which a better distribution of the joint products of labor and capital may be secured and our laboring classes be saved from justifiable discontent by having the opportunity to work at living wages in every month of the year. They are, first, secure to productive labor a larger proportion of the joint production of labor and capital; and second, to make such statutory provision for the Territories and the District of Columbia and appeal to the Legislatures of the several States also to provide by law that eight hours or less shall be the longest period in any one day that man or machinery may move in productive employment. [Great applause.]

How these vital changes are to be accomplished I do not see. In other lands the effort will be made through blood and carnage. Here, where the laborer's vote is of as much weight as that of the millionaire, the revolution, for such it will be, will doubtless come peaceably, but its coming is inevitable, and this fact should be forever in the contemplation of the legislator. I see but one way through which we can reach this great result; it is, if need be, to realize the wish of Jefferson, not by putting a sea of fire between us and other manufacturing countries, but by enacting a tariff that will so far secure our home market to our producers that manufacturers may afford to run their machinery eight hours and pay those who attend it a day's work for this amount of labor.

It is for our country and our countrymen we legislate. Our country is unlike any other. It is in the breadth and the infinite variety of its resources sufficient unto itself, and could live if it imported nothing but what would be exchanged for that which would be surplus within our limits. Our Government is also unlike any other. It is not a monarchy; it is not a despotism; it is not an oligarchy; but is a free democratic Republic, of which every human being born within its limits is a citizen, entitled to the rights of a free man, and with the duty laid upon him of assisting in the maintenance of the perpetuity of a government which can live only so long as virtue, intelligence, and independence characterize its citizens. May that Government be immortal. But, friends and countrymen, this it can not be if we are to enter it in the unholy race Britain is making with barbarous nations for the "cheap and nasty" under the terrible teachings of the "dismal science." [Great and continued applause.]

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, it is a fact admitted by all that the present rate of taxation is too great. It is a fact admitted by all that there is a demand in all parts of the country for a reduction of its burdens. If we intend in good faith to respond to that demand it is important for us to consider where we will begin the work. Shall we repeal the internal-revenue taxes, as demanded by some, or shall we reduce the tariff, as demanded by others? It can not be denied that increased consumption will follow the reduction of price of any tax-bearing article. The whole list is before us. What articles on these lists commend themselves most strongly to our consideration to be cheapened in order that their consumption may be increased among the people? Is it whisky or food? Is it whisky or clothing? Is it whisky or the implements of labor? Reduction must take place on some of these articles, and we must now determine what we will reduce. The people demand a reduction of taxation, but I do not understand that they are clamoring for cheaper or more abundant whisky, but that the necessaries of life may be placed within easier reach of those who labor for their daily subsistence.

But there are some here and elsewhere who denounce the whisky-tax as an "infernal tax" and demand its repeal. Whence comes this demand? Who are these zealous reformers that are compassing sea and land and preaching a crusade for the emancipation of whisky from the clutches of the tax-gatherer? Who is it that is so eager, so zealous, so importunate for cheaper and more abundant whisky? It does not come from those who make it, who pay taxes on it, who sell it, or who drink it. These are strange facts. But there is a constant pressure for the repeal of the internal-revenue tax and that tax only. It comes from those who quaff the sparkling juice of the grape, which is taxed more lightly than whisky. It comes from a combination of manufacturers, national bankers, and bondholders. Why are they so anxious for its repeal? Because all three of them are interested in the perpetuation of the public debt, and the annual revenues of the Government are paying off that debt at the rate of a hundred million every year.

The bondholder has his fortune invested in that debt. It is a sure and safe investment on which he pays no taxes, either national, State, or municipal. If his bonds are paid he must invest his capital where he will not feel so secure and where he will have to join other people in helping to support his State and local government. But the internal revenue is paying this debt, and therefore to him it is an "infernal tax." The national bankers own $350,000,000 of these bonds. The Government has paid them 90 per cent. of these bonds in dollars as good as gold, and a bill is on the Speaker's table which has passed the Senate to pay them a hundred cents on the dollar and yet continue to pay them interest on the whole sum nominated in the bonds. They have a mortgage written upon the muscles of the laboring people of the whole country to secure the payment of principal and interest. They do not want the debt paid. When it is paid they will draw no more interest from the people on their investment. But the internal revenue is paying the debt, and to them it is an "infernal tax."

The manufacturer has been rolling the public debt as a sweet morsel under his tongue. Whenever the people, prostrated by exorbitant taxation, complain of the burden he is always ready with an answer to the complaint by pleading the necessities of high tariffs to meet the annual interest of the debt. If the debt is paid his plea will be gone and high tariffs will go with it. Therefore the internal-revenue tax to him is an "infernal tax." These three powerful classes are deeply interested in the retention of the public debt as long as possible, and if possible forever. They are constantly piling argument on top of argument and entreaty on top of entreaty to have this "infernal tax" repealed.

Since the war we have repealed more than three hundred millions of internal-revenue taxes. We have repealed all the taxes on incomes, all the taxes from railroad and telegraph companies. We have repealed heavy taxes imposed on domestic manufactures. We have repealed taxes on bankers, on liquor dealers, and on the manufacture of playing-cards. And now, when the consumer of clothing and food and the implements of labor ask you to cheapen the necessaries of life to him only 20 per cent., you offer him free whisky or nothing. You gave away to bankers and whisky dealers and the manufacturers of patent medicines about $40,000,000 last year, and you thought that would stop paying the public debt. But it did not, and now you want to give up the tax on whisky. Now, what shall we reduce? The question is pressing upon us for settlement. It will not down. It can not be evaded. Shall we repeal the whisky tax and perpetuate the debt, or shall we retain the whisky tax, continue the payment of the debt, and relieve the people by reducing taxation on the necessaries of life?

The bill which we present you joins issue sharp and decisive with those who urge the repeal of the internal-revenue tax. It demands reduction of taxation on the necessaries of life—on the food which the people eat, the clothes they wear, the implements with which they work. The proposition which we ask you to support is a very moderate and conservative one. It is extreme in nothing. It was drawn with a view to harmonize all elements of opposition to high taxes. It does not meet my views. It does not reflect my opinions. But at a time when all admit that taxation is too high, it ought to be agreed that a very moderate reduction of 20 per cent. ought to be made on the necessaries of life.

But it is argued that this bill provides for a horizontal reduction, and that horizontal reduction is unequal, unjust, unwise, and impolitic. It would seem from what we hear that the committee had gotten up some novelty and brought to the House. Why, sir, we have had horizontal taxes on our statute-books from the very dawn of the Government. Look back through the history of our taxation and you will see an old law that imposes a horizontal tax of 10 per cent. on all goods imported into this country in foreign ships. You will see another old law which imposes a horizontal tax of 10 per cent. on all goods produced in countries east of the Cape of Good Hope and imported from points west of that cape.

In 1833 the great compromise tariff introduced by Mr. Clay, the father of protection in this country, was passed by Congress. Under that law there was a horizontal reduction of the tariff of 10 per cent. in 1833, a horizontal reduction of 10 per cent. in 1835, a horizontal reduction of 10 per cent in 1837, a horizontal reduction of 10 per cent. in 1839, and in 1842 a horizontal tariff of 20 per cent. was reached by the sliding scale, and it was agreed that that should remain the law of the future, and that the bill should be regarded as a settlement of a long-vexed question—"a treaty of amity and peace," as it was characterized by its distinguished author. These are not all of the horizontal taxes we have had during our history. In 1865 there was a horizontal increase of 20 per cent. on the taxes levied on the schedules of domestic manufacture; and in 1866 there was a horizontal reduction of 20 per cent. on domestic manufactures. In 1872 there was a horizontal reduction of 10 per cent. on the schedule of imported goods, and in 1875 there was a horizontal increase of 10 per cent. on imported goods.

So that horizontal taxes, though not the wisest and best for some reasons, are not entirely unknown to our laws.

Mr. Chairman, the passage of this bill, while it reduces the present high rate of taxation only 20 per cent., will be a very substantial relief to the people. But great as are all the benefits that will flow from a reduction so moderate on articles entering into every-day consumption by the people, that is but half of its benefits. It will remove many obstructions that impede and cripple our foreign trade. It will increase the importation of foreign articles. It will increase the exportation of domestic articles. It will cheapen the products of manufacture. It will increase the value of the products of agriculture.

A mere glance at the manifest of our foreign trade exhibits the fact that it is composed chiefly of agricultural products on one side exchanged for manufacturing products and articles entering into manufacture on the other. Four-fifths of our exports of domestic merchandise are the products of the farm and field, and they must remain so for many years to come, because we live in a new country where the soil is rich and cheap and the climate mild and genial. With comparatively small expenditure of capital and labor it produces large crops. It is the market that supplies the food to the thickly populated and older countries of the world where the land is too poor to produce and too costly to till. To labor in shops and factories is the law of necessity to the crowded populations of Europe. To labor in the field and farm is equally the law of necessity to the sparse populations who live on the cheap and fertile lands of the United States.

By the inexorable law of necessity the European manufacturer and the American farmer are customers of each other, and our agriculture is seriously involved in all legislation that restricts the importation of foreign goods. If we keep out foreign manufactures we keep in our agricultural products and force them to sacrifice upon a market largely oversupplied and where there is little demand. After supplying all our home wants we have a large and constantly growing surplus that can only find markets in foreign countries. What is to become of this surplus? Year by year it grows greater. More than half of our people live by the labor of the field, and the prosperity of all depends upon its success. All who live by labor in manufactories, mines, and transportation, all the professions and all the occupations, depend upon the success of the farm for employment and subsistence. Whatever we do the interest of all demands that agriculture shall not be injured.

But if we refuse the products of the foreigner he is compelled to refuse ours, for he has nothing to give in exchange. Trade is the mutual exchange of equivalents. We send to Europe the surplus products of our farms because we can produce them cheaper here than they can be produced there. They send us in return the products of their manufactories because they can be produced there cheaper than here. Each product goes from the lower to the higher market to obtain the increased value. Each sends to the foreign market to sell because it is the highest market for the export. Each sends to the foreign market to buy because it is the lowest market for the import, and in both cases both parties are actuated by the motive of gain, which is the sole motive that actuates all trade, foreign and domestic.

Our foreign trade, therefore, being an exchange carried on mainly between our farmers and foreign manufacturers, every hinderance thrown in the way of that trade is a serious injury to our agriculture, and through it to the whole country. Our crops are now far beyond the requirements of our home consumption, and for the want of sufficient markets they are decreasing in value as they increase in quantity. What are we to do? If the foreign market is closed against us our agriculture is prostrated at a blow. This is a matter of the deepest concern to the West and South. The North and East do not produce such large crops because their soil and climate do not permit it. The large body of their farming products is marketed at home, but in the West and South that grow the wheat and corn and cotton and raise the provisions that constitute the greater part of our exports it is almost a question of existence. The people in the New England States and New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey have markets at home for nearly all of their farm products. The country there is not exclusively adapted to either agriculture or manufactures. Each branch of industry finds a market with the other. It is not so with us in the West and South. We must either have the foreign market or none.

The chief of the Bureau of Statistics, in a report recently laid on our tables in reference to the German tariff on our pork, says that 93 per cent. of the total exports of hog products from the United States during recent years have consisted of the surplus products of the States of Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, Tennessee, Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa, Minnesota, and Wisconsin. These are the people you are striking when you prohibit the importation of foreign manufactures, for every dollar of importation you prohibit you likewise prohibit the exportation of a dollar's worth of the products of agriculture.

But you say you do not prohibit us from exporting; you want us to export all we can and sell for gold and bring it home and buy domestic goods. How would you do in trading with Italy, that has no gold, but only a paper money, and Austria and the Argentine Confederation? Some countries carry on their exchanges in depreciated paper, worth little at home and nothing abroad. There your trade would stop. But suppose every people had a gold and silver circulation, you could not trade on such terms. The coin of a country is its home circulation. It can not be sent off except in small amounts to settle balances, and then it in due course of trade returns again.

But suppose we demand of Great Britain the gold for the four hundred millions of farm products we send her, it would take all her gold to pay for one crop. As our policy is to sell, not to buy, we will not send that gold back again. Next year we will have another crop to sell. How can she buy? Her gold is all gone; she can not get it back. Why, sir, it is absurd to talk about international trade carried on by selling for gold and buying nothing. International trade is an exchange of one commodity for another. The question returns upon us, what will we do with our surplus agricultural products? You meet us again with another theory. We must encourage the growth of home manufactures; we must put the consumer and producer side by side, and make a home market for our agricultural surplus. Now, it is a sufficient answer to this to say that for twenty years we have had this system in all its vigor, and yet we have not had the consumer of our agricultural products side by side with our farmers in the South and West.

After twenty years of high protective tariffs the farmers of Iowa and Kansas and Nebraska and the rest had to go to Europe to find consumers. But suppose all the manufacturing establishments in the East were taken up and carried West, with all their laborers, would they consume any more in the West than in the East? The consumption would be the same. In order to make a home market for our surplus agricultural products there must be an increase of manufacturing laborers twice or three times as great as the present number; but that can not be, because the present amount of manufacturing labor is sufficient to make all the products our people can consume, and then they can not get work full time. So their number can not be increased, but the agricultural laborers are increasing all the time, and the question still remains unanswered, What is to become of our surplus agricultural products?

My venerable friend on the other side [Mr. KELLEY] gives us still another theory. He says we must diversify our industries. The farmer is to be consoled by the advice to stop farming to such excess and go into manufactures and reduce the product of the farm and increase the product of the factory. This carries him still deeper into the Serbonian bog. How can any considerable number of farmers change their occupation? It takes large capital, skill, and training to carry on manufactures successfully. Our farmers are men in but moderate circumstances. They have their little farms and the stock and farming implements necessary to till them. They have no capital to go into manufactures, and besides there are more products now being manufactured than can be consumed.

All these theories are fallacious and deceitful. The farmer is shut up to his occupation. There is no escape from it. He can no more abandon it than the pilot can abandon his ship when the storm is driving it on the reefs and rocks. It is the merest trifling to tell him to quit the plow and go to the forge or the loom. You tantalize him when you advise him to abandon the only occupation by which he can live and go to manufacturing. When he asks you to take the hand of the Government out of his pocket you tell him to stop farming and go to the end of the rainbow and gather gold! The question what is to become of our surplus agricultural products that are increasing in quantity and decreasing in value for want of markets, remains unanswered. Now, let me show you what high tariffs have done for our farmers since we have had them. In 1850 the value of all farm products was $1,299,197,682. In 1860 the value of all farm products are not given, but the quantities are. These largely increased, and so did the value of all farm products. Mr. Grosvenor, in his work, "Does protection protect?" says of that crop:

> By far the greater part of our production of wealth is by means of agriculture. The annual product of that branch of industry according to the census of 1860 was about $2,598,393,364.

Hon. Robert J. Walker, ex-Secretary of the Treasury, in a letter addressed to the people of the United States, November 30, 1867, says:

> From 1850 to 1860 our agricultural products increased 95 per cent. and our manufactures 87 per cent., being in both cases nearly double any preceding ratio of increase.

These two gentlemen are both accurate statisticians. I take Secretary Walker's statement of the value of the crop of 1860, not because I think it more accurate than Mr. Grosvenor's, but because it is a little less.

Ninety-five per cent. increase on the crop of 1850 would make the value of the crop of 1860 $2,533,435,659.

The value of all farm products in 1870 as given by the census was $2,447,538,630. The value of all farm products as given by the census of 1880 was $2,213,402,564.

From these figures it will be seen that the crop of 1880 was not as great in value as that of 1860 by $300,000,000. Had that ever occurred to you? Notwithstanding there were 4,000,000 more men laboring in the fields to make that crop; notwithstanding there were 120,000,000 more acres in cultivation; notwithstanding there were three thousand millions more money invested in farms and farming implements than in the year 1860—yet the entire value of all farm products was largely under that of 1860, twenty years before that. How did this occur? How could it be so? Was there a blight on the fields? No. Was the crop destroyed by mildew or the army worm? No. On the contrary, the crop of 1880 was twice as large as that of 1860. Everything of farm production increased in quantity. Then how could the value of the farm products in 1880 be under that of 1860? It was the result in the fall of the price of farm products. And that was caused by the high-tariff obstructions that were thrown in the channels of commerce in 1861, and which obstructions still remain. Now, let us see what farmers have made by high tariffs.

If we take the whole agricultural products of 1860 and divide that by the number of those whose labor produced that value, we find that the farmers realized, in 1860, $778 each, in 1870, $413 each, and in 1880, $289 each. So it seems that high tariffs that keep him out of the foreign markets with his products are not very beneficial to him. The manufacturer did not fare so badly. While he did not prosper as he did under the low tariff of 1860, he did better than the farmer. He had a million more men employed in 1880 than he had in 1860, and a thousand millions more money invested; but he made a profit of 36 per cent. over cost of wages and material, while he made 47 in 1860; but the farmer made little or nothing above subsistence. While the price of agricultural products has fallen so since 1860, have manufactured products fallen at the same rate? No. If you will look at the reports of the Iron and Steel Association you will see that pig-iron was higher in 1880 than in 1860, and so was bar-iron, and so was railway bars. If you will look at a schedule of the prices of protected articles you will not see the same decline; you will see window-glass and many other things higher instead of lower; and for the best of reasons: the high tariffs compel the farmer to sell in the markets where the supply is already greater than the demand, and it compels him to buy in the market the products of manufacture where demand is greater than the supply, and he loses both ways.

These are startling figures, and the unhappy condition of our farmers is the logical result of the destruction of their markets. His products had to be forced to sale in markets oversupplied when there was little or no demand, and of course at ruinously low prices.

The uniform result of high tariffs has been to increase the price of the protected articles and decrease the price of farming products. We began the policy of protection in 1816 as a temporary policy. The doctrine was advocated before that, but all the tariffs prior to 1816 were revenue tariffs. In 1816, having just passed through a trying war with Great Britain, our statesmen favored a temporary protection to infant manufactures till they could stand alone, in order that the Government might be independent and self-supporting in time of war. This was the ground on which Mr. Dallas placed his support of the Walker tariff of 1846. In giving the casting vote that passed the bill through the Senate, he said:

> The struggle to exert without abatement the constitutional power of taxation in such a manner as to protect by high duties on imports many of the productions of our own soil and labor from the competition of other countries has endured for more than thirty years. During that period a system of high taxation has prevailed, with fluctuations of success and failure. It ought to be remembered that this exercise of the taxing power was originally intended to be temporary. The design was to foster feeble "infant" manufactures, especially such as were essential to the defense of the country in time of war. In this design the people have persevered until these saplings have taken root, have become vigorous, expanded, and powerful, and are prepared to enter with confidence the field of fair, free, and universal competition.

In 1816, when we began to protect infant manufactures, especially cottons and woolens, it was stated by Mr. Clay that protection was only wanted for three years. And when the act was passed a protective duty of 25 per cent. was put on cottons and woolens till 1819. After that they were to return to the revenue standard of 20 per cent. In 1818, a year before the temporary policy was to expire, Congress again extended the protective duty to 1826. What was the effect of this policy at its first inauguration? The first thing that attracts our attention is the falling off of our foreign trade. Our imports that year were one hundred and forty-seven millions; they declined for years throughout the whole protective period, and did not reach that amount again till 1835. From 1800 to 1816 our foreign trade increased 42 per cent., and from 1816 to 1832 it decreased 20 per cent. From 1820 to 1830 our foreign trade was not as great as from 1800 to 1810, notwithstanding the war between the British orders in council and the Berlin and Milan decrees, that made the high seas a field for the plunder of neutral goods as well as the continent under the command of the armies of France and England. During that period every spot on the ocean was a scene of conflict, and "the highway of nations was almost without a flag floating on its surface except the flag of commercial marauders." Yet this dreadful conflict between these exasperated belligerents was not so destructive to our commerce as the high tariffs from 1820 to 1830. Cotton and breadstuffs fell 50 per cent. after the tariff of 1816. In 1824, when the tariff was again increased, our foreign trade again fell off. In 1828 the tariff was again increased until it became so odious that it was characterized as the tariff of abominations. Our foreign trade again fell. Our imports in 1830 had fallen from one hundred and forty-seven millions in 1816 to seventy millions. And that period from 1820 to 1830 is admitted to be the darkest period in our history. In 1833 the compromise tariff was enacted that put the country on a sliding scale from protection to revenue.

Now, we have seen our foreign trade falling off every time the tariff was increased. Do we see the same thing when it is reduced? On the contrary, our imports rose from one hundred and eight millions in 1833 to one hundred and eighty-nine millions in 1836. Our foreign trade increased 40 per cent. by 1841. How did it affect agricultural products? Just as it does always when markets are opened for their sale. Agricultural products rose, and manufacturing products fell. From 1835 to 1842 raw cotton rose 60 per cent. and cotton goods fell 40 per cent. In 1839 raw cotton was worth 15 cents per pound. Between 1833 and 1842 woolen manufactures increased 60 per cent. while flannels, blankets, and other woolen goods were constantly falling in price. Why, the exports of the manufactures of iron increased during the existence of the gradually falling duties till 1842, when they showed an increase of 300 per cent. for the whole period.

In 1842 the revenue tariff was repealed, and a high protective tariff was again adopted. The same result follows this that followed the tariffs of 1816, 1824, and 1828. Foreign trade falls off, and as a consequence agricultural products fall in price. Cotton, which was 15 cents a pound in 1839, is 6 cents in 1843; other farm products shared the same fate with cotton. Protected articles, such as cotton goods, woolens, iron, and sugar, rose from 20 to 100 per cent. So depressed were all farm products that the year 1843, succeeding the year of the high tariff, has been characterized as the low-water mark of the century. The exports of iron, which increased 300 per cent. under the revenue tariff of 1833, decreased 50 per cent. under the protective tariff of 1842.

On the 30th day of July the Walker tariff was enacted, to go into effect the 1st day of December, 1846. How was our foreign trade affected by this low revenue tariff? It increased so much that from the 1st of December, 1846, to 1st of December, 1847, the revenue had increased eight and one-half millions notwithstanding the very great reduction of duties. How did this affect agricultural products? Just as a revenue tariff always does when it opens a way for them to market. Agricultural products rose from July 30, 1846, to December 1, 1846, 23½ per cent. on an average; cotton rose 18.3 per cent; wheat, 17.3; rye, 18; corn, 24.5; oats, 40.9; barley, 24.7. Seven of the principal crops as shown by the Secretary of the Treasury in his report of that year had increased in value during the six months succeeding the passage of that bill more than $115,000,000, and it was estimated that the increased value of the whole crop for the same period was three hundred and fifty millions. This additional value was given to the agricultural products of the country because the tariff of 1846 opened a way for them to market. But that is not all of its benefits to the farmers. It decreased the prices of manufactured products correspondingly. It added three hundred and fifty millions to his crops, but it added three hundred and fifty millions to the purchasing power of his money.

High tariffs hurt us all when we buy, but they hurt the farmer twice. They hurt him when he sells and hurt him when he buys. But did not the low tariff of 1846 ruin the manufacturers? I have heard all sorts of statements made about the pernicious effects of that tariff on our manufacturers. The official records show that our manufacturers prospered under the low tariffs from 1846 to 1860 as they never did before, and as I am sure they never will again until the way is again opened for our agricultural products to foreign markets.

I have here a statement showing the average annual increase of the values of the products of domestic manufactures. One period is from 1850 to 1860 under low tariffs, the other from 1860 to 1880 under high tariffs. Manufactures increased at 8 per cent. per annum in the first period and 6 in the second; capital invested in manufactures increased 8 per cent. for the first and 6 for the second; cotton goods increased 7 per cent. in the first and 3 per cent. in the second; woolen goods, 4 per cent. in the first and 11 per cent. in the second; iron, 8 per cent. in the first and 7 per cent. in the second; steel, 90 per cent. in the first and 14 per cent. in the second; paper, 11 per cent. in the first and 7 per cent. in the second; leather, 10 per cent. in the first and 10 per cent. in the second; rolled iron, 10 per cent. in the first and 17 in the second; pig-iron, 5 per cent. in the first and 17 per cent. in the second; glass, 8 per cent. in the first and 6 per cent. in the second; printing, 18 per cent. in the first and 9 per cent. in the second; musical instruments, 15 per cent. in the first and 9 in the second; agricultural implements, 15 in the first and 15 in the second; silk, 47 in the first and 15 in the second; hosiery, 60 in the first and 16 in the second; boots and shoes, 7 in the first and 6 in the second.

It will be seen that there were but three exceptions in all the manufactured products in the United States. All increased more in the low-tariff period than in the high-tariff period except woolen goods and rolled iron and pig-iron. There is a substantial reason for each of these exceptions. By the tariff of 1842 all wool under 18 cents a pound was dutiable at 5 per cent. By an oversight in the act of 1846 all wool was dutiable at 30 per cent., which was the same as all manufactures of wool. The result was that the woolen business was almost destroyed. In 1857 all wool under 20 cents was free, and for three years the woolen business increased rapidly and showed by the census of 1860 43 per cent. increase for the decade, the greater part of which increase occurred between 1857 and 1860. During the period between 1860 and 1880 there has been an enormous duty both on wool and woolens, which has given the market almost exclusively to the domestic producer.

The increase of rolled iron and pig-iron in the high-tariff period is due to the great demand for iron and steel rails to meet the extraordinary growth of our railway system during the last twenty years. Our own factories were unable to fill the orders, and had to increase their capacity for production to meet the extraordinary demand. It is said that a great many furnaces went into bankruptcy between 1846 and 1850. There were some bankrupt establishments that failed, but there were twenty-seven blast-furnaces started in Pennsylvania during the same time. There were 500,000 more tons of coal burned in the iron furnaces in that State in 1847 than in 1846, and a million more tons in 1850 than in 1846. That does not look like they had been destroyed. The product of iron increased from 1852 to 1856 at 55 per cent., while under the high tariff of 1842 it only increased 42 per cent. From 1852 to 1856 there was the strongest competition the iron interest ever had in the United States. Enormous importations of iron poured in to meet the demand of our railroad companies, which were extending their lines with great rapidity.

But notwithstanding the severe test to which they were subjected they kept their fires lighted, their chimneys smoking, and their anvils ringing. They passed the severe ordeal successfully and not only drove the foreigner out of the home market but invaded him in the foreign market. In 1850, of all the iron consumed in the United States 93 per cent. was domestic production and 7 per cent. foreign. In 1860, with a low revenue tariff of 24 per cent., still of the entire consumption 93 per cent was domestic and 7 imported. Now, that is a very important fact for protectionists to consider; but that is not all of it yet. In 1870, under a high tariff on iron, only 90 per cent. of the consumption was made at home, and only 92 per cent. in 1880. Of the home consumption of cottons in 1850, 77 per cent. was domestic production and 23 per cent. foreign; while in 1860, when the duty was only 19 per cent., 93 per cent. was domestic product and 7 per cent. imported. The importations of cotton decreased 50 per cent. from 1850 to 1860; but in 1870 the domestic product, under a high protective tariff, was only 89 per cent. and the foreign 11 per cent. of the home consumption, and in 1880 it was 90 per cent. to 10.

Now what does this prove? It proves conclusively that you can do better without commercial restriction than with it. It proves that iron and cotton did stand alone without protection and prospered more than it has done with all its aids. Now why is this?

A MEMBER (to Mr. MILLS). Do not hurry. We will extend your time.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, we gave the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] all the time he wanted; will the same courtesy be extended to me? If so, I need not talk so fast.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas be allowed all the time he wants.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair). The gentleman from Texas has sixteen minutes remaining but the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman have leave to continue his remarks so long as he may desire. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MILLS. I thank the committee for its courtesy.

Have we not heard here all the time that if our tariff is low the pauper products of Europe will come in and drive our people into bankruptcy? This idea arises out of a total misapprehension of the whole question. As I stated at the outset, every dollar you let come in lets another one go out. Wealth is made both by what we import and what we export. The more people trade the richer they get, when they give a day's labor for that which would cost them more than a day's labor to produce. Our natural wealth increased from 1850 to 1860 at 126 per cent., or over 12 per cent. per annum, and from 1860 to 1880 at 6 per cent. per annum. Why did our wealth increase twice as fast under a low revenue tariff as it did under a high protective tariff? It was our foreign trade that did it. There is a striking similarity between the growth of our national wealth and our foreign trade. From 1830 to 1850 our national wealth increased 4.72 per cent. per annum. Our foreign trade increased for the same time at 3.56 per cent. per annum. From 1850 to 1860 our national wealth increased at 12.60 per cent. per annum and our foreign trade at 11.70 per cent. per annum. From 1860 to 1880 our national wealth increased at 6.30 per cent. per annum and our foreign trade at 5.25 per cent. per annum. It was our growing commerce that made our wealth grow so fast from 1850 to 1860, and that enabled the people to buy more manufactured products, and that increased the domestic production. High tariffs by destroying our commerce destroyed our wealth, injured our farmers, and retarded the production of our manufactures. When we struck down our commerce we "killed the goose that laid the golden egg."

Let us take one small item to show how exchange makes us grow in wealth. In 1872 railway bars were worth $37.50 in England and $75 here. Now it is evident that with the tariff out of the way $75 would add one more ton of railway bars to the wealth of the country if bought in England than it would if bought in Pennsylvania. The high tariff destroys that value by keeping that ton away; and so it does every article it keeps away. We send abroad domestic commodities to the amount of $800,000,000. If it were not for the tariff we would send more, and then the $800,000,000 would be increased in value 10 or 15 per cent. and it would bring back things produced at the least cost of production abroad, and they would bring additional value to the country.

If the wealth of the country had increased from 1860 to 1880 as it did from 1850 to 1860 our national wealth would to-day be over sixty billions instead of forty-three. The increasing wealth of the country enables the people to purchase and consume more of the products of manufacture, and that keeps their laborers engaged and gives them constant employment. When the wealth is decreasing or its rate of increase is slackened the people are less able to satisfy their wants, there is less demand for the products of manufacture and less employment for their laborers. During the last twelve months numbers of industrial establishments have had their doors closed because the people are not able to buy and consume their products.

My colleague on the committee [Mr. HEWITT] is trying to help the manufacturer out by giving him free raw material so that he may go into the foreign market, as he can not find a sufficient demand in the home market to keep his works going and his laborers employed. His measure only gives half relief. I want to give him both the foreign and home market and both filled with buyers, who want his products and have the capacity to purchase them. That can only be done by extending our foreign commerce as far as we possibly can. Not only should we put raw materials on the free-list, but the manufactured product should be burdened as lightly as possible. Would not that ruin our manufacturers? Why, 85 or 90 per cent. of all the manufactured products of the United States can be made here cheaper than they can be produced abroad and delivered here.

If we were to break down all the barriers that stop our trade, and support the Government by an income tax, a tax on whisky and some other things, and leave our trade as free as possible, the domestic producer would supply 85 or 90 per cent. of all the manufactured goods we consume. There are many things which we could not supply. There are secrets in the manufacture of certain goods which give to certain persons the monopoly of their production. There are certain countries that are specially adapted to certain manufactures. We do not manufacture broadcloths, as I am informed. The finest silks can only be produced in the dry climate of France and Italy. I saw a gentleman take from his pocket this morning a piece of cloth that is only made at one place in the world, and that one place in France.

Fine laces may be made in Belgium which could not be made here. But we can make with the full competition of the world 85 or 90 per cent. of the whole amount we consume cheaper than it can be made in any foreign country and delivered to us. The history of our manufactures under the tariff of 1857 is proof to my mind of that fact. That tariff had duties running down from 24 to 5 per cent., and our manufacturers were never so prosperous. Let us look at the exports of 1860. That will show the condition of the country, and especially of its manufactures.

I have a table here showing the per cent. of annual increase of our exports for two periods: one from 1850 to 1860, under low revenue tariffs, and the other from 1860 to 1880, under high protective tariffs. The exports of all domestic merchandise increased 12 per cent. per annum in the first period and 6 per cent. in the second; agricultural products, 13 per cent. in the first period and 5 per cent. in the second; domestic manufactures, 12 per cent. in the first period and 5 in the second; cotton goods, 13 per cent. in the first period and 5 in the second; iron and steel, 19 per cent. in the first period and 5 in the second; hats, 20 per cent. in the first period and one-quarter of 1 per cent. in the second; boots and shoes, 60 per cent. in the first period and decreased in the second; wearing apparel, 15 per cent. in the first period and decreased in the second; earthen and stone ware, 30 per cent. in the first period and 3 per cent. in the second; glass, 10 per cent. in the first period and 9 per cent. in the second; tin, 20 per cent. in the first period and 14 per cent. in the second. Now, sir, this does not look like breaking down our manufacturers by low tariffs. It shows that we not only kept our home markets but we were invading the foreign manufacturer in the markets of the world, and that our manufacturing industry did better under low tariffs than it did under high tariffs designed especially for its protection.

But it is contended that high tariffs necessarily make high wages, and that the laborer working in the factory is the chief beneficiary of that policy. As proof of that we are cited to the fact that our manufacturing operatives get higher wages than the same class in England, where there is free trade on all the products of manufacture. It would be a sufficient answer to this to say that operatives in England get higher wages than operatives of the same class in France and Germany, where they have high tariffs as we have here. If it is a logical result that follows high tariffs, why does it not have the same effect there that it does here? If high wages are produced by high tariffs, why is the rate of wages different in different localities in the United States?

The rate of wages paid iron-workers is not the same in Chicago that it is in Pittsburgh. The rate of wages paid to cotton-workers is not the same in Lowell that it is in Columbus and Atlanta. The tariff is the same in all these places, and if the tariff fixed the rate of wages the wages would be the same. But the tariff does not regulate the rate of wages. It may for a time give higher profits to the manufacturer, but it can not compel him to give wages above the market price, and he does not do it. Like all other people he buys what he wants at the lowest price for which it can be procured, and labor is no exception to the rule. Wages are not governed by an act of Congress but by the demand for work, and the amount of work ready to respond to that demand and the ability of the employer to pay for it.

When the people are all prosperous and wealth is accumulating rapidly there is a great demand for work, because the wants of a people always increase in proportion to their ability to satisfy them. When the people are not prosperous and wealth is not rapidly accumulating there is a lessening demand for work, because there is a lessened ability to employ and pay for it. When there is a great demand for labor it is high. When there is little demand it is low. Now, the question which the laborer is interested in determining is how to increase the demand for his labor. Labor is high here now compared with what it is in Europe, because the demand here is greater than the supply, and there the supply is greater than the demand. Our country is new, theirs is old; our country is sparsely settled, theirs is crowded; our lands are cheap and rich and theirs are high and worn. Labor is more profitable here than there. It can make more in a given time here than it can there, and the price of the wage is the measure of the value of labor, as interest is of the value of money.

Agriculture is the controlling industry that regulates the rate of wages in this country, because it has three times as many laborers employed as manufacturers, and more than all other industries combined. It controls the price of wages just as the larger market controls the prices in the smaller. The markets in New York control the prices in Jersey City, and the large quantities of wheat sent by the United States and Russia to England control the prices at which the few thousand bushels from Chili and Brazil must be sold in Liverpool and London. The constant demand of agriculture to cultivate our cheap and fertile lands keeps up the price of labor. And when wages begin to decline it is a sure indication that the farmer is not prospering. If wages are to stay high, it must be because agriculture is profitable. It is indispensible that the national wealth must be constantly increasing among the people to enable them to employ labor.

When we had low tariffs from 1850 to 1860 the national wealth increased at 126 per cent. and the rate of wages increased at 16 per cent. Under the high tariffs from 1860 to 1880 the national wealth increased at half that rate and the rate of wages increased at 8 per cent. The high tariffs retarded the increase of the fund that employs labor, lessened the capacity of the people to pay for it, that lessened the demand, and that lowered the price.

Now, how is the wealth of the people to be increased and diffused? It is by every one working to accomplish the greatest results by his toil. The farmer must be permitted to cultivate his field to the best advantage, and sell his products in the markets that offer the highest prices, and buy in the markets that offer the lowest. By that means his wealth is increased. He demands more labor to employ his capital and more of the products of manufacture to satisfy his wants, and that gives increased employment to manufacturing labor. The extent of the consumption of manufactures depends on the capacity of the people to purchase. And the rate of wages in manufactures depends on the amount of consumption. Labor will not be employed to produce faster than the product is consumed, and when the consumption is arrested overproduction soon compels cessation of work, the fires are put out and the laborer discharged.

The purchasing power of wages is not as great now as it was in 1860. The chief of the bureau of statistics of Massachusetts reports that wages were 10 per cent. less valuable in 1881 than in 1860. Why was labor less vlauable in 1881 than in 1860? Because the people were less able to employ labor and consume its products. And why was that the case? Because high tariff had prevented them from accumulating wealth by buying on the lowest markets and selling on the highest. The high tariff now prevailing had reversed the law that governs the production of wealth and compelled the farmers, the greatest producers of wealth in the country, to sell on the lowest markets and buy on the highest. Continue this policy for a few years longer and the most disastrous consequences may ensue. Compel the consumers of Europe, who are the customers of our farmers, to go elsewhere to find cotton and wheat and provisions, and our agriculture falls prostrate in the dust. Then the farmer can no longer employ his own operatives, and they will be turned loose to seek employment in other industries, and that will bring the wages of all labor down. Then he will not be able to consume the products of manufacture, and production must stop and the manufacturing laborers must be discharged. Then will come a period of distress, and in their desperation a few more towns and cities may be burned.

Mr. Chairman, agriculture, manufactures, and commerce are the chief sources of wealth and power in all countries. Each of these great industries is intimately connected with and dependent upon the others. Each rises toward its highest prosperity where all are unfettered and free. Each finds its highest development in the highest development of the whole. Each receives injury when the growth of the others is arrested. It is a delusion to believe that manufactures can be promoted by obstructions interposed in the way of the growth of agriculture and commerce. Every country that aspires to fill the full measure of its greatness and power must cultivate to the highest point every branch of its industry and remove from its way every hindering cause that retards its progress. Commerce is an indispensable element of national power, and no country has ever attained great eminence without a large and extended commerce.

All people of whom we have any account in history have been traders. The earliest records of the human family show them to us engaged in traffic, and the more they have extended their commerce the more they have grown in wealth, progress, and power. In the earlier ages of the historic period, as we read in the old book that lies on the family table, the Ishmaelitish merchantmen carried the spices and balms of Canaan into Egypt and exchanged them for corn. But Israel only rose to the highest point of her power and glory when her merchant king pointed her people to the sea, bade them build ports and ships and carry the commerce of the world. It was under the illustrious son of David that Zebulon became "a haven for ships," as the patriarch had prophesied centuries before. Her capital became renowned throughout the earth for its wealth and magnificence.

The inspired chronicler tells us that he made silver to be as stones in Jerusalem. Amid all the principalities and powers of the East the little kingdom of Israel was as a city set upon a hill that could not be hid. But her light went out, and she went down "like a bright exhalation in the evening," when her commerce died with her king. The Phœnicians and Carthagenians lived by the shores of the Great Sea and for centuries were the carriers of the world's commerce, and the wealth and splendor of Tyre and Sidon and Carthage are themes that have come down through the many centuries that intervene between them and us. The Venetians were a feeble people who were driven into the islands of the Adriatic by the powerful hordes that overran and devastated Southern Europe, but they cultivated commerce as the only pursuit left them by their more powerful masters, and by commerce alone they outstripped all the nations of Europe in amassing wealth. Venice was the banking-house of the world in the Middle Ages and the carrier of its commerce; but Venice sank into oblivion when the bond that wedded her to the sea was broken.

History tells us that Holland was once among the great powers of Europe, and Amsterdam was the world's banker, and when we search in her history to find that period we find it when her fleets were on all the waters of the world, carrying on an extended and growing commerce, and when the Dutch admirals carried the inverted broom at their masts as a symbol that they swept the seas. Portugal, too, was one of the leading powers of the earth, and the page of her history points to her meridian when her bold navigators were buffeting with storms in the southern ocean hunting a passage around the Cape of Good Hope for Portuguese commerce to India.

Spain, in old age and decay, the skeleton of that tremendous power that once made itself felt in all the countries and climes of the earth, recalls a period in her history when she overshadowed the earth with her name; when she had colonies on all the continents and among all the islands of the seas; when her laws, her language, and her literature were among all people from the grandees of Castile to the Indians and Aztecs of Mexico; but that period she finds was when her ships were carrying rich argosies from the opposite side of the globe and pouring them into her lap at Barcelona and Cadiz and Seville.

In the vicissitudes of national life England stands to-day at the head of the column; her wealth was never so vast; her power was never so great; her people were never so prosperous, so well fed, so well clothed, so well housed, so well contented. She carries more than half of the world's commerce in her bottoms and more than one-fifth of the whole is her own. Her capital is to-day the banking-house of the world, and though she can not boast of mines of gold she has more gold than any nation in Christendom. She is investing in railways, mines, and manufactures in all parts of the world, and her investments are yielding an income that returns to her annually more than $300,000,000. She has received within the last thirty years in commercial exchange with other people $9,000,000,000 more than she has sent away.

When we look back through our past history we read on its pages that there was a time when American vessels spread their white wings to the winds on all the oceans; when the ensign of the Republic was seen and known in all the ports and harbors of the globe; when by the very spell of its name it gave protection to the person and property of its citizens in all kingdoms and countries. Then it was the acknowledged symbol of a free, fearless, and powerful people who were too just to ask anything but what was right and too strong to submit to anything that was wrong; then when it rode at the mast of an American vessel it consecrated every plank on its decks as holy ground, where every citizen of the Republic and every stranger within her gates might repose with security upon the sinews of a powerful arm.

It mattered not whether it was an American seaman who had pledged his faith to her Constitution and laws, or a Hungarian exile who had been driven by the storms of oppression upon the horns of her altars for refuge, the shadow of that flag covered with immunity every one upon whom it fell. Then the poorest and the humblest might go whithersoever he would and find shelter and safety in all lands, on all seas, under all skies. Then we had commerce and battle-ships and naval power. Where now is that naval armament that once disputed with England the sovereignty of the seas? Where now are our commercial fleets that once shared with her the profits of the carrying trade of the world? Our ships are all rotted, our seamen are all dead. Ichabod is written on the folds of the once powerful ensign of the Republic, and the eye seeks in vain for its broad stripes and bright stars among the ten thousand masts that crowd the harbors of the world.

God grant that the day may soon come when American ships, freighted with American commerce, shall again go to sea under the shield and protection of our own flag. But if that day is to come it must be preceded by a reversal of the policy of commercial restriction. We must remove both by legislation and diplomacy every hindering cause that prevents the free exchange of the products of our labor in all the markets of the world. We must unfetter every arm and let every muscle strike for the highest remuneration for its toil. We must let wealth, the creation of labor, grow up in all the homes of our people. Then every industry will spring forward at a bound, and wealth, prosperity, and power will bless the land that is dedicated to free men, free labor, and free trade. [Loud applause.]

Mr. RUSSELL obtained the floor.

Mr. CANNON. Before the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] proceeds, and before the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] takes his seat, I desire to ask the gentleman from Texas a question. If I caught his remarks correctly, he stated some time during his speech that the value of the agricultural products of 1880 in the United States was less than the value of the agricultural products of 1860.

Mr. MILLS. I do say that fact appears from the census returns. I knew it would astonish you.

Mr. HORR. It does, because it is not in any way true.

Mr. MILLS. That is a very convenient argument which you protectionists always resort to. When you are confronted with an argument that you can not escape you say it is not so. But what I say is: I give you the official returns of the census, and the Superintendent of the Census himself tries to explain the fact.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask the gentleman if he believes that to be true?

Mr. MORRISON. He has already told you that it is in the census.

Mr. CANNON. I ask the gentleman if he believes it to be reliable.

Mr. MILLS. I think that like all other tables there may be some imperfections about it, but I have no doubt the main body of it is true.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the gentleman give in figures the agricultural values of 1860?

Mr. MILLS. I have given them from Mr. Walker and from Mr. Grosvenor, of your city.

Mr. HORR. We have the report right here.

Mr. MORRISON. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] will yield I will move that the committee now rise.

Mr. HORR. Let this matter be settled. I have no doubt the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] desires to be correct, but the figures are against him.

Mr. MORRISON. Put in the figures yourself when you get the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] yield for a motion that the committee rise?

Mr. RUSSELL. I will yield for that motion.

Mr. EATON. Why not let this thing be settled now?

Mr. MORRISON. The gentleman is going to make a speech, and he can make the correction then.

Mr. EATON. It ought to be settled before it goes to the country; it is incorrect, I know.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5893) to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. The naval appropriation bill has been returned from the Senate with amendments. I move that the bill, with the Senate amendments numbered, be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, was ordered to be printed with the Senate amendments numbered, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CORRECTION OF ERROR OF ENROLLMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following from the Senate:

Whereas in Senate bill 1063, entitled "A bill to amend the Revised Statutes in relation to the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," which passed the Senate on the 1st day of April, 1884, in that clause of said bill amending section 549 of said Revised Statutes, by an error of the print, it is described as section 459, and with such error the said bill has passed the House of Representatives and been enrolled: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the figures in said act descriptive of said section of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia be changed from 459 to 549.

The resolution was concurred in.

H. J. T. MOSS.

Mr. THROCKMORTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6661) for the relief of H. J. T. Moss; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 1252) for the relief of Millie E. Hays, widow of John Hays, deceased; and

A bill (S. 1871) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to offer a reward of $25,000 for rescuing or ascertaining the fate of the Greely expedition.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 16, 1884.

Prayer by Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D., of Washington, D. C.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 450) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a ponton wagon-bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the city of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa," was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

DISTRICT COLORED SCHOOLS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from Hon. J. B. Edmonds, president of the board of commissioners of the District of Columbia, communicating, in response to a resolution of June 29, 1882, information concerning school premises for colored schools in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CALL. I have in my hand a letter from Rev. John E. Myers, trustee of the Presbyterian church at Saint Augustine, Fla., in the nature of a memorial, accompanied by a certificate of the commanding officer of the United States forces at Saint Augustine, Fla., during the war, which he asks be referred to the Committee on Public Lands to be considered in connection with a bill introduced by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BEC ].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the paper will be received and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CALL presented the petition of C. C. Lopez, president of the school board of Saint John's County, Florida, praying for the passage of the bill now pending before the Senate Committee on Public Lands donating to the city of Saint Augustine in trust certain unused lands within the city limits; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the petition of J. K. Rainey, president of the board of aldermen of Saint Augustine, Fla., praying for the passage of a bill donating to that city certain unused land; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ALLISON presented a memorial of newspaper publishers of Council Bluffs, Iowa, remonstrating against the passage of a news-copyright bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Wilton, Iowa, and vicinity, praying for an appropriation for education in Alaska; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Clayton County, Iowa, praying that a home for disabled soldiers may be located in the State of Iowa; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the P. M. Coder Post, No. 98, Grand Army of the Republic, of Vinton, Iowa, urging the adoption of the recommendations of the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa; which was read, as follows:

[Joint resolution No. 14.]

Joint resolution and memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa relating to the Des Moines River lands.

Whereas the settlers upon what is known as the lands granted to the Des Moines Navigation and Railroad Company believe that no action has ever been taken relating to these lands in which the United States and the interest of the United States have been fairly, properly, and adequately represented in court; and

Whereas the said settlers desire that the United States may be fairly and fully represented in the court: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the house of representatives of the State of Iowa (the senate concurring), That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be earnestly requested to exert themselves to secure the prompt passage of a bill which shall in some way provide that the Attorney-General of the United States shall immediately institute proceedings, or cause such proceedings to be commenced at once, by action either in equity or at law, as may be deemed best, and appear in the name of the United States, so as to remove all claims from the title of said lands, and that in such action or actions to be instituted as aforesaid any person or persons in the possession of or claiming title to any land or lands under the United States, involved in such action or actions, may, at his or her expense, unite with the United States in the prosecution of said action or actions for the purpose of forever settling the title or titles of the person or persons claiming said lands.

Approved April 1, 1884.

State of Iowa, ss:

I hereby certify the foregoing to be a true and correct copy of the original on file in this office.

[SEAL.] J. A. T. HULL, Secretary of State.

Mr. ALLISON. I believe a bill substantially carrying out the wishes expressed in this memorial has been reported from the Committee on Public Lands. Therefore I ask that the resolution lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of Margaret Smith, widow of Joseph Smith, late a soldier in the Mexican war, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLAIR. I present a memorial of the Liberty League of New York city, signed by William Godwin Moody, chairman of the committee on public lands, addressed to the two Houses of Congress, in which the memorialists say that they "respectfully and earnestly call the attention of Congress to the great wrongs done against the people and Government in the disposition made of the public domain, and especially to those transactions by which the people have been robbed of their heritage for the enrichment of railroad corporations." Then follow sundry historical examples cited as illustrative of a like policy pursued in former times and alleged to be instructive to the present, with a petition for remedial legislation. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR presented a resolution of the State Grange of New Hampshire, in favor of constituting the Commissioner of the Department of Agriculture secretary of the same and a Cabinet officer; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I present a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, signed also by a large number of citizens of that State, which sets forth: first, that it is desirable that the metallic money of the United States should consist of gold and silver coins of interchangeable relative value, and that coinage should be restricted to the needs of commerce and the wants of the people; second, that the amount of silver dollars now accumulated in the Government vaults is largely in excess of these requirements, and that it has been demonstrated by experience that this excess can not be utilized at present as a circulating medium, and that it is desirable that the coinage of silver dollars shall be suspended for a period of at least two years next ensuing, and that in order to bring into gradual circulation the surplus silver coin now in the Treasury the further issue of bills of the denomination of one and two dollars shall be discontinued.

This memorial is signed by the president and secretary of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York and by several thousand citizens of the State. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON presented the memorial of Messrs. Hammond Brothers, of Fremont, Nebr., remonstrating against the passage of the news-copyright bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also presented a memorial of Seward Post, No. 3, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Nebraska, praying for certain pension legislation; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL presented the petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh, Pa., praying for the passage of the Lowell bankruptcy bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of W. B. Roberts and 64 other manufacturers and inventors, citizens of Crawford County, Pennsylvania, praying that no law to abridge the rights of patentees be passed; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented a memorial of manufacturers and inventors of Wilkes Barre, Pa., and the memorial of G. H. Perkins, of Philadelphia, Pa., remonstrating against the passage of certain bills to amend the patent laws; which were referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the repeal of the act relating to vinegar factories established and operated prior to March, 1879; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Vessel-Owners and Captains' Association of Philadelphia, praying that Congress make the appropriation necessary to maintain the United States Naval Hydrographic Office; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented eight memorials of citizens of Beaver and other towns in Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the passage of the news-copyright law; which were referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also presented the petition of A. H. Jackson Post, No. 299, Grand Army of the Republic, of Pennsylvania; the petition of A. T. Pontius, and 47 other members of Craig Post, No. 75, Grand Army of the Republic, of Pennsylvania; and the petition of E. J. Rice Post, No. 211, Grand Army of the Republic, of Factoryville, Pa., praying that Congress comply with the recommendations of the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic in relation to pensions; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a memorial of the Maimed Soldiers' League, of Philadelphia, Pa., in favor of an increase of pension to $40 a month to those having lost an arm or leg in the service; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL. I present the petition of the Philadelphia Maritime Exchange, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. 4168) making an appropriation for the purchase of Theodore Hunter's Port Charges of the World for the use of United States consuls. I suppose the petition should go to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will go to the Committee on the Library, according to the usual practice, matters relating to the purchase of all books being so referred.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is not for the use of the Library, but only for the use of consuls as such officials. I spoke to the chairman of the Committee on the Library and he thought it might go to the Committee on Commerce. A bill on the subject was referred to the Committee on Commerce in the other House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred, if there be no objection, to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PLUMB. I present resolutions adopted by the Western Kansas Cattle-Growers' Association, an association thoroughly representative of the cattle interests of that State, in favor of the passage of what is known as the pleuro-pneumonia bill. I move that the resolutions lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented a petition of the Louisville (Ky.) Board of Trade, praying for a suspension of the coinage of silver; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, presented a petition of wool-growers and others interested in the woolen industry in the State of Nevada, praying for a restoration of the duty on wool; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LOGAN presented resolutions adopted by Elmos Ryon Post, No. 382, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Illinois; resolutions adopted by Dexter Post, No. 336, Grand Army of the Republic, of Wellsville, N. Y.; resolutions adopted by Augustin Post, No. 179, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Illinois; resolutions adopted by Dunham Post, No. 141, Grand Army of the Republic, of Decatur, Ill.; resolutions adopted by Manns Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Baldwin, Randolph County, Illinois; resolutions adopted by John Musser Post, No. 365, Grand Army of the Republic, of Orangeville, Ill.; resolutions adopted by Andy Hosmer Post, No. 342, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Illinois; and resolutions adopted by Olney Post, No. 92, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Illinois, in favor of the recommendations of the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic in regard to pensions; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a memorial of the Wyoming Stock-Growers' Association of Wyoming Territory, remonstrating against any legislation amendatory of the land laws which would cripple the stock-growers' industry in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented seven petitions of officers of the line, United States Army, praying for the passage of Senate bill 1677, extending the provisions of section 1207 of the Revised Statutes to the lieutenants of the line of the Army; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of Dr. John W. Mitchell, late surgeon Fourth Regiment United States Colored Troops, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Edwardsville, Ill., remonstrating against the proposed changes in the patent laws; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented a petition of members of the Ohio Legislature, praying for the appointment of Hon. John P. Green on the commission to investigate the condition of the colored race as proposed by Senate bill No. 1464; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the Legislature of New Mexico, praying that unjust discrimination in supplying forage to military posts in that Territory be removed; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of colored men of Connecticut in convention assembled, praying favorable action on Senate bill 1464, creating a commission to inquire into the condition of the colored people; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented the memorial of H. J. Dunlop, of Champaign, Ill., remonstrating against the passage of the news-copyright bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also presented a petition of Hicks Post, No. 216, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Illinois, praying general legislation favoring ex-Union soldiers; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of regimental quartermaster-sergeants, headquarters district of New Mexico, Santa Fé, N. Mex., praying for an increase of their pay to $34 per month and the establishment of a grade of post quartermaster-sergeants; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SEWELL presented a memorial of Hugh Boyd, of New Brunswick, N. J., and a memorial of the Chimes Printing Company and other firms, of Paterson N. J., remonstrating against the passage of the news-copyright bill; which were referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also presented resolutions adopted by Ulric Dahlgren Post, No. 25, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of New Jersey, in favor of the recommendations of the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic in regard to pensions; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hold in my hand a copy of a memorial of the executive committee of the Civil-Service Reform Association of Missouri, being resolutions declaring "that in the opinion of this league it is indispensable to a complete reform of the civil service that Congress should repeal the act of May 15, 1820, and acts supplementary thereto, now embodied in sections 769, 1864, 2217, 2244, 2613, and 3830 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, by which the tenure of administrative offices was fixed at four years, for the purpose and with the effect of creating periodical vacancies in said offices to be filled by the appointing power. The practice of rotation in office thus introduced into the subordinate civil service, by what Mr. Jefferson at the time denounced as 'a mischievous law' and as a baneful source of intrigue and corruption, is foreign alike to republican principles and to sound business methods. To the Executive it secures the partisan advantages, while enabling him to escape the odium and the responsibility of arbitrary and causeless removals from office. To the faithful public servant the menace of partisan attack is only postponed, not averted; while the temptation to abuse the appointing power for partisan ends still remains, even though restrained in part by the present civil-service rules." They "therefore advocate, as the next urgent step in this reform, a return to the early practice of the Government, under which, while no right or property in any office was recognized, nor any life or permanent tenure was created, the fidelity and good behavior of public servants, as in the case of private agents, was made the sole condition of the continuance of their employment. And it is recommended to all civil-service associations throughout the country that they make strenuous and unceasing effort in the direction of this further and most necessary reform, and the executive committee of the league is hereby authorized and directed to take such action as they may find expedient and practicable in aid of legislation in the sense of this resolution."

I am informed that the original of the memorial was sent to the Civil-Service Association in New York and will probably be transmitted to the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. I move that the copy of the memorial which I now present be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SAWYER presented resolutions of the Henry W. Cressy Post, No. 42, Grand Army of the Republic, Tomah, Wis., and resolutions of the Edward Saxe Post, No. 135, Grand Army of the Republic, Wautoma, Wis., in favor of an increase of pensions to soldiers, their widows and orphans; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 521) for the relief of Ernest H. Wardwell, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 969) for the relief of William J. Smith, late collector of customs for the port of Memphis, State of Tennessee, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1437) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of David A. Hawk, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARRISON introduced a bill (S. 2048) granting a pension to Elizabeth Templeton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BECK (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2049) granting a pension to James King; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILLIAMS introduced a bill (S. 2050) for the relief of Eliza Clarke, of Louisville, Ky.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SABIN introduced a bill (S. 2051) to revive the grade of General of the Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2052) granting a pension to William Gieseking; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL introduced a bill (S. 2053) for the purchase of a site and erection of a public building at the city of Wilkes Barre, Pa.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 2054) regulating the use of avenues, streets, alleys, and reservations in the city of Washington; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the Senate to authorize the change of certain figures in the enrollment of the bill (S. 1063) to amend the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 503) to increase the endowment of the University of Alabama from the public lands in said State;

A bill (S. 1252) for the relief of Millie E. Hays, widow of John Hays, deceased; and

A bill (S. 1871) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to offer a reward of $25,000 for rescuing or ascertaining the fate of the Greely expedition.

PAUL STROBACH.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "Concurrent and other resolutions" are in order. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution offered yesterday by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire and report whether Paul Strobach, whose confirmation as marshal of the middle and southern judicial districts of Alabama has been rejected by the Senate, is now discharging the duties of that office, and whether he is entitled to execute the powers and duties of such office in the place of M. C. Osborn, who was suspended by order of the President in the vacation of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the question presented by the resolution for the consideration of the Committee on the Judiciary is one of importance, and it becomes of singular importance because it brings up what I suppose to be a conflict between a decision of the district court of the United States in Alabama and the hitherto entertained opinion of the Senate in respect of the proper interpretation of the tenure-of-office act, the act of 1869, commencing with section 1767 of the Revised Statutes and going down to section 1770.

M. C. Osborn was confirmed by the Senate on the 16th day of April, 1880, as marshal of the middle and southern districts of Alabama. That was four years ago to-day. His term of office expires to-day. On the 17th of March, 1883, he was suspended by the President, and Paul Strobach was appointed to discharge the duties of the office during such time as the statute would authorize him to do so. On the 18th day of December, 1883, Strobach was nominated for the same office by the President, and he was rejected by the Senate on the 5th of February, 1884. After Strobach's rejection by the Senate Osborn appeared in the district court of the United States and moved that he be reinstated in his office, contending that the rejection of Strobach, who was the temporary incumbent by appointment of the President, reinstated him under the statute.

The court heard arguments upon that question and made a decision, which has been reported by the Attorney-General of the United States in his reply to a resolution of this body, in which the court held that there was no vacancy in the office, but that the office was occupied by Strobach under temporary appointment, and that his appointment would continue until the end of this session of the Senate unless it should be vacated by order of the President.

So it appears that to-day the office of marshal to which Osborn was confirmed by the Senate on the 16th of April, 1880, is vacant by the expiration of the term, and it appears also that, under the decision of the district court of the United States, Paul Strobach has the right under the statute to hold the office until the end of this session of the Senate. That is a question that I thought merited the attention of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate and of the Senate also, and that it was my duty to bring it forward and have a decision here through which it could be determined whether it is within the power of the President of the United States to protract the term of office of a marshal beyond the limitation of four years, which the statute says shall be the term during which he may hold and exercise the duties of marshal.

I maintain that at least on to-day there is a vacancy in the office; but Strobach is still discharging the duties and functions of the place. I shall not submit an argument to the Senate upon this proposition now, for the reason that I know the Judiciary Committee will take cognizance of it at a very early day and will be prepared to enlighten us upon what is the proper interpretation of the statute.

I have thought it also my duty to bring it to the attention of the Senate because, the Senate having rejected Strobach's nomination and Strobach still continuing to occupy the office, I have felt that a wrong was being done to the people of the State of Alabama.

Without expressing any opinion as to the merits of Strobach in respect of the office, it is my duty to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that on the 11th of May, 1883, he was indicted in a number of cases for presenting false and fraudulent accounts against the United States in his character of deputy marshal when he was discharging that office under Mr. George Turner, who was the predecessor of Osborn in the office. Quite a number of indictments were found, to some of which demurrers were sustained, and afterwards when Judge Woods took the bench the demurrers were overruled and the indictments were held to be good. Finally, upon that class of cases, on the 9th of June, 1883, there was a verdict of not guilty in favor of Strobach, but on the 22d day of May, 1883, in the same court a different batch of indictments, which did not contain charges as to the same offenses but of kindred offenses, were filed against him, and among the number was an indictment of perjury. That was filed on the 22d of May, 1883, and that indictment was nolprossed by the order of the United States Attorney-General in a letter which he addressed to the district attorney, Mr. Smith, dated January 19, 1884.

Strobach was nominated to the Senate in the face of this indictment December 18, 1883, and was rejected on the 5th of February, 1884. The Attorney-General of the United States submits a letter with his report in reply to the resolution of the Senate, dated Washington, December 17, 1883, with a postscript to it dated January 19, 1884, and in that letter, after proceeding to state that he caused investigation to be made into the criminality of Strobach and into the question of the manner in which he had been acquitted of these other cases, not including the case of perjury, he says:

> This all being done from abundance of caution, I laid the whole matter before the Solicitor-General of the United States and Mr. Simons, the attorney for the Department of Justice in the Court of Claims. They, too, examined the subject with care, and both agreed that the acquittal was contrary to the evidence, and that the man ought to have been convicted, and they further suggested and reported that there ought to be a trial upon some one of the pending indictments, even if it resulted in an acquittal, thinking that the ends of justice required that at least.
> During these examinations I expressed to none of these gentleman any opinion upon the subject, but I purposely abstained from even forming one. It is now my duty to pass upon it, and I do so. It is plain to me that there could have been no malicious feeling toward this man, inasmuch as the officers who first investigated his accounts and detected his offenses went to Montgomery in the ordinary course of their duty, without having any knowledge of him whatever, or of any one connected with him, and never having been brought in contact with him until they undertook the examination of those accounts.
> The general agent, too, was unacquainted with him, knew nothing of him, or of anybody connected with him, and after the report made by the examiners, and after the district attorney had indicted him, was by my special order detailed to go to Montgomery and see to the prosecution of the complaints, being specially cautioned in the first instance by me verbally, and then by telegraph and by letter, to see that Mr. Strobach was fairly tried, without any appearance of official pressure or hostile feeling by the Department through its agents.
> The district attorney preferred the bills of indictment, having examined the subject, and the grand jury found them. The man was tried, and during the course of the trial, and afterward, a great clamor was raised in his behalf, asserting that he was unjustly and wickedly prosecuted. Why he could have been unjustly and wickedly prosecuted I can not see. There was no motive or purpose to answer that could have prompted any one of those who originated and conducted the prosecution. He was prosecuted as a legal necessity. It was the duty of the agents of the Department, having found these causes of original complaint, to pursue them in the ordinary and orderly course of criminal litigation, just as other marshals have been pursued and punished.

I shall not detain the Senate by reading the entire letter of Mr. Brewster, the Attorney-General. He proceeds, however, to say toward the conclusion of the letter that there may be some doubt resting upon the mind of somebody as to the result of a further hearing of the cases as to whether a trial of these new indictments would result in conviction. He says:

> In view of all this, and to save great expense, I have concluded to direct that these cases be abandoned, seeing no practical result that would be answered by another trial, and thinking it would be improper, illegal, and unjust to try a man where there is even a doubt if the issue has not been determined in his favor in a former trial.

In the postscript to this letter the Attorney-General says:

> This opinion and order was prepared on the 17th of December, 1883. I laid it aside for reflection and suspended action, and while I was absent on public business in New Orleans Mr. George Turner, representing Mr. Strobach, called on me recently, and on two occasions stated that my suspended action as to these pending bills of indictment stood in the way of the action of the Senate on Mr. Strobach's confirmation. Hearing this, I have again taken this up, and I have, with some misgivings, concluded to say I will order the indictments to be nolprossed. I do so because the district attorney's convictions can not be had, and because, also, there is a doubt if the former trial did not dispose of them, and to avoid expense in an experimental prosecution when it is my duty to reduce expenses.

The indictments, it seems, must give way so as to leave the Senate unembarrassed in acting on the question of Strobach's confirmation.

The singular case is presented of this opinion having been written on the 17th day of December, 1883, in which the Attorney-General expresses the moral conviction of the guilt of Strobach in those cases notwithstanding his acquittal by a jury, and then on the 18th day of December, 1883, the next day, the President sent in his name for confirmation to the Senate of the United States. This case, I say, presents the singular feature of a man being indicted in the circuit court of the United States for perjury connected with his office of marshal, and that pending that indictment, and while the Department of Justice is prosecuting it and the Attorney-General says he is doing it in good faith and upon a thorough conviction as to his duty after a full examination by special agents into the guilt of the marshal, his name should be sent here for confirmation. It is still more strange that it should be done on the 18th of December, 1883, when this opinion of the Attorney-General was filed on the 17th of December, 1883, and then that the order for the nolle prosequi, which the Attorney-General says he gave reluctantly, should not have been made until the 19th of January, 1884.

During all that time the Senate was considering the nomination of a man indicted for perjury in the circuit court of the United States, and while he was being prosecuted, in good faith, by the Department of Justice.

If the President of the United States can put such a man as that into office and hold him there in virtue of powers conferred or supposed to be conferred upon him under the statute until the end of this session of the Senate, and that, too, notwithstanding the term of office to which he was temporarily appointed expires on this day, then I think it is time that the Senate of the United States had in some way or other attempted to remodel the statutes upon this question.

I must presume that if these facts had been known to the entire administration and not simply to the Department of Justice this man would never have been put in the place, especially under an order or a commission which would hold him in his position until the end of this session of the Senate. I must assume that the President of the United States could not have known of the action of the Department of Justice in this case, for if he did that would reveal a misunderstanding and disagreement between the President and the Department of Justice which presents a very curious and a very embarrassing case to the Senate and to the Congress and to the world.

For surely the Congress of the United States can not look with composure upon a controversy between the President of the United States in making an appointment and the Department of Justice in resisting it of an officer who is to be under the control of the Department of Justice, that officer bringing to the attention of the country the fact that the man is under indictment for perjury in the circuit court of the United States at the time, and that the Attorney-General of the United States upon a full examination of the evidence believes him to be guilty morally, if not legally; and that he believed also that the cause of public justice, of public morals, required his prosecution, whether it might turn out that he would be convicted or not; and that the Attorney-General believed that there ought to be an investigation of these facts in a judicial way, which had been presented in reports to the President of the United States.

I maintain that the tenure of office fixed by the statute can not be enlarged by the order of the President under any circumstances. We have the singular condition to-day presented, under section 1769, of an office that is actually in abeyance while Congress is in session, and that must be filled, if filled at all, by an appointee of the justice of the circuit court who may preside in Alabama.

Under section 1769 provision is made in respect of an office falling into abeyance, having no incumbent, and it being impossible for the President under existing conditions to make a nomination to it. In that case the general law provides the manner in which the office shall be filled temporarily, or, to express it more accurately, the person who shall discharge the duties and functions of the office until a regular appointment can be made.

Here we have the curious instance of an office being in abeyance during the session of the Senate, no authorized incumbent, and yet all the powers of the Government requisite and necessary to fill this office existing, and the office in that State is vacant; and I might add that the person who is now discharging the duties of the office is going about from county to county and district to district over that State exploiting in the preliminary or primary conventions of a political character. Perhaps he is more useful in that capacity while he controls this office.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that this matter ought to address itself to the serious consideration of this body, and that it is necessary that the Senate should take some action in this case at an early day in order to define more perfectly and to vindicate its authority in cases of this kind. A district court holds that there is no vacancy in this office, and I think that it is the duty of the Senate to declare that there is a vacancy, and of the President and the Senate to proceed to fill it up.

Is it true that the rejection by the Senate of a man who is thus assailed by the Department of Justice is to have no effect upon his holding the office after that rejection? I must assume, of course, that the Senate in rejecting Strobach had cognizance of the public facts which appear on the files of the different Departments; and concurring thus—for they must have concurred—in the opinion of the Attorney-General, that the Senate declared that Strobach was not a proper man to be charged with the duties of the office. And it was at least a reasonable expectation that, after its action in the rejection of Strobach, there should have been some other name sent here to fill up this office and thereby prevent it going into abeyance, with no one to discharge its duties except some appointee that might be selected by a circuit justice of the United States.

I move to amend the resolution by striking out the word "vacation" and inserting in place thereof the word "recess."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has a right to modify his resolution.

Mr. MORGAN. I modify my resolution to that effect, and I ask the adoption of the resolution as modified.

Mr. CONGER. Let the resolution be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read as modified.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DAWES. It was agreed yesterday that Senate bill 1755, then under consideration, should be taken up after the morning business today.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is not yet concluded. Concurrent and other resolutions are still in order.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to make a report from a committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the understanding referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts, as reported in the RECORD, does not apply until the call for resolutions is gone through with.

OHIO CUSTOMS COLLECTION DISTRICTS.

Mr. CONGER. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1926) to define the boundaries of the collection districts of Miami and Sandusky, in the State of Ohio, to report it without amendment, and I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill. There is a dispute about the boundaries, and it is important to settle it.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the bill be read at length for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 2603 of the Revised Statutes is hereby so amended that the district of Miami, in the State of Ohio, shall comprise all the waters and shores of Lake Erie within the jurisdiction of the United States from the western bank of the Portage River to the western bank of the Miami River, in which Toledo shall be the port of entry; and so that the district of Sandusky shall comprise all the waters and shores of Lake Erie within the jurisdiction of the United States from the eastern bank of the Vermillion River to and including the western bank of the Portage River, and all the islands at the head of Lake Erie lying east of a line drawn north from the west bank of the Portage River at its mouth, in which Sandusky shall be the port of entry. Vessels shall be allowed to ply between the port of Toledo, in the Miami district, and any of the said islands, in the same manner, and subject to the same conditions, only, as if said islands were in the district of Miami.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to say that the boundaries of the two customs districts as defined here have been considered heretofore the boundaries for many years, but by some examination at the Department there is an uncertainty as to a strip of territory along the Portage River, and at the request of the Department this bill is prepared to define the boundaries.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISPOSAL OF SCHOOL LANDS.

Mr. DOLPH. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1483) to amend an act passed February 15, 1843, chapter 33, to authorize the Legislatures of certain States to sell certain lands appropriated for school purposes, to report it favorably and without amendment. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ALLISON. Let the bill be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The bill was read.

Mr. INGALLS. Is there a report in the case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No.

Mr. INGALLS. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, it was Ordered, That the petition and accompanying papers of Mary A. Hughes be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

SURPLUS DEPOSITS WITH THE STATES.

Mr. GARLAND. I ask leave to call up the resolution submitted by me on the 14th of April, which is now on the table.

Mr. DOLPH. I wish to ask the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] to withdraw his objection to the bill just reported.

Mr. HARRIS. I rose for the same purpose for which the Senator from Oregon has risen, and that is to ask——

Mr. GARLAND. I do not yield. I want to get rid of a resolution I offered the day before yesterday that will take but five minutes. I understand the Senator from Kansas interposes an objection to the consideration of the bill and it has gone over.

Mr. HARRIS. That is true, if the Senator from Kansas shall decline to withdraw the objection.

Mr. GARLAND. I move to take up the resolution I introduced the day before yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas moves to take from the table a resolution, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire whether the Secretary of the Treasury should not be authorized and directed to carry out the provisions of the thirteenth and fourteenth sections of the act of Congress approved June 23, 1836, entitled "An act to regulate the deposits of the public money," by making the deposit of the fourth installment, which was postponed by the act of Congress of October 2, 1837, entitled "An act to postpone the fourth installment of deposit with the States," with such of the States then entitled thereto and which have not received the same out of the present existing surplus revenue not otherwise appropriated in the manner provided by said act of 1836, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator anticipate debate?

Mr. GARLAND. I will only take about five minutes to explain the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, under the act of the 23d of June, 1836, entitled "An act to regulate the deposits of the public money," three installments of deposit were made, and on the recommendation of Mr. Van Buren, in October, 1837, the fourth installment was withheld, and there has been no payment or advance made since that day. The fourth installment to be distributed to all the States amounted to $9,367,214.97. The matter has stood in that condition ever since the withholding act of October, 1837, and at almost every session of Congress the Secretary of the Treasury brings the matter to our attention on account of the applications made by the different States from time to time for the advance or deposit of this fourth installment. He declines because there is no action of Congress since the act of 1837 withholding the installment. Finally the State of Virginia made an application for a mandamus to the Supreme Court of the United States against the Secretary of the Treasury on behalf of herself and all other States for the payment of this fourth installment. The Supreme Court decided that mandamus, and in the latter part of the decision say as follows:

But the legislative department of the Government seems, purposely, to have refrained from making the fourth installment of deposit a charge directly upon any revenues accruing since January 1, 1839. Since the last direction given by Congress upon the subject the financial necessities and obligations of the Government have been largely increased, and this circumstance, perhaps, suggests the reason why the legislative department has not fixed any day for the final execution of the act of 1836. Be the reason what it may, we are of opinion that the Secretary of the Treasury has no authority under existing legislation and without further direction from Congress to use the surplus revenue in the Treasury, from whatever source derived, or whenever, since January 1, 1839, it may have accrued, for the purpose of making the fourth installment of deposit required by the act of 1836.

So, whether it is the right of the State to ask for this installment as a legal obligation, or whether the action of the Secretary of the Treasury is right in withholding it, depends at last on the action of Congress; and it is with that view that I present this resolution, to call the attention of the Committee on Finance to the condition the matter is in and ask them to investigate it and declare whether in their judgment the Secretary of the Treasury should be authorized and directed to make payment of this fourth installment, or, if not, what legislation is necessary, if any, in their judgment to bring the matter to an adjustment. For that purpose the resolution is introduced, and I ask its adoption.

The resolution was agreed to.

SIOUX INDIAN RESERVATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions" that order is closed.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the Senate now to take up Senate bill 1755, which was under consideration yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1755) to divide a portion of the reservation of the Sioux Nation of Indians, in Dakota, into separate reservations, and to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will proceed.

Sections 14 to 16 inclusive were read.

Mr. DAWES. I move to add after the word "reservation," at the end of section 16, the words:

And for any land acquired by any such agreement to be used in connection therewith.

They have separate agreements, one for a right of way and one for stations and town lots. This is to include all of their agreements.

The amendment was agreed to.

Sections 17 and 18 were read.

Mr. DAWES. Immediately after the word "act," in line 5 of section 18, I propose an amendment, to insert:

Or if any such land is so occupied upon the Santee Sioux reservation in Nebraska.

There is a reservation in Nebraska that goes along with this.

The amendment was agreed to.

Sections 19 and 20 were read.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I wish to offer an amendment which I have submitted to the chairman of the committee and it is sanctioned by him. In line 4 of section 20 I move to strike out the words "of existing homestead acts" and insert "of the homestead laws of the United States." As the section now is it confines the entries that may hereafter be made so that they must conform to the existing homestead laws; that is, the homestead laws existing at the time of the passage of this act. It is possible that Congress may hereafter think it advisable to amend the homestead laws; and the object of the amendment is that these lands shall be disposed of according to the then existing homestead laws.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 20, line 4, it is proposed to strike out the word "existing," before the word "homestead," and to insert "the;" and also to strike out the word "acts," after "homestead," and insert "laws of the United States;" so as to read:

That all the lands acquired by the provisions of this act, except American Island, shall be disposed of by the United States to actual settlers only, under the provisions of the homestead laws of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], who was upon the committee, desired to offer an amendment at this point, in which the committee acquiesced, but the Senator is not here, and in his stead and in his absence I will offer his amendment. It is, after the word "therefor," in line 11 of section 20, to insert:

But the rights of soldiers shall not be abridged except as to said 50 cents per acre.

They have a right of residence, which is counted by the time they served in the Army.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. The word "town," where it occurs in line 17 and also in line 18 of section 20, should be "city;" so as to read "City of Chamberlain" in both places.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARLAND in the chair). If there be no objection, that correction will be made.

Mr. DAWES. Subsequently the word "town," in line 22, should be changed to "city."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That change will be made.

Mr. DAWES. The words "the same" should be "said island," in line 26.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, this amendment will be agreed to.

Sections 21 and 22 were read.

Mr. DAWES. I move to strike out "six months of," in line 11, section 22, and insert "one year from;" so as to read:

Which proof shall be so presented to him within one year from the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I omitted an amendment prepared by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], in section 20, immediately after the word "void," at the end of line 14, to insert:

And provided further, Nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to affect the right of Congress or of the Territorial government of Dakota to establish public highways or to grant to railroad companies the right of way through said lands.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. In the eighteenth line the word "Provided" should be "And provided further."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I offer the following additional section:

SEC. 23. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000, which sum, together with the unexpended balance of the $10,000 appropriated in the act of March 3, 1883, for procuring the assent of the Sioux Indians to an agreement therein specified, may be expended in defraying the necessary expenses of procuring the assent of the Sioux Indians to this act as provided in the preceding section, and the same shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior and be repaid to the Treasury from the proceeds of the sale of the land authorized by this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I feel it my duty to ask unanimous consent of the Senate to redeem the promise that I made something more than a week ago to give some sort of answer to the speech made by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK]; and rather than interpolate a speech into the bankruptcy bill, although I think that bill an exceedingly appropriate bill to precede some tariff bills, I ask unanimous consent that I may occupy the attention of the Senate this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate has heard the request of the Senator from Vermont. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. Unanimous consent is given; and the Senator from Vermont will proceed.

Mr. MORRILL. Never was the old proverb more true than to-day, that "Evil communications corrupt good manners." I hope I am justified in claiming to be generally an observer of the rules of the Senate and do not make speeches on the tariff when an education bill is the order of the day; but my friend the distinguished Senator from Kentucky a little more than a week ago set the bad example of making an irrelevant speech, and, like Dryden's Alexander at the famous Persian feast—

> Fought all his battles o'er again;
> And thrice he routed all his foes; and thrice he slew the slain.

The Senator's ostensible excuse was that it might be the only chance afforded to him "to lay before the Senate and the people the iniquities of the present tariff system of taxation." My excuse is that it may be my only chance to lay before the Senate and the people the iniquities of the Senator's speech. This labor on my part has not been sought, but I fear even the Senator himself would think me remiss in my duty if I were to omit that special attention to which, from his recognized ability, he is so well entitled.

It is obvious from the abundance of his rather bitter epithets that the Senator starts out with a preconceived theory that the present tariff is wholly bad, and he seems quite ready, as a Brahmin would say, "to believe a piece of sandal-wood to be a flame of fire." Even his friends, like the Senator from Mississippi, compliment the ability and apologize for the chronic idiosyncrasies of the Senator from Kentucky, as follows:

Right here in the speech of the Senator from Texas on yesterday the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] interposed, whose attention I have no doubt was called to this debate by hearing the words "taxation for revenue," for it seems the Senator from Kentucky dreams of "revenue," "taxation for revenue," "tariff for revenue," sees it in clouds, "hears it in the wind;" it is his morning lullaby, if I may so say, and his last requiem at night.

This may be too flattering, but I can not have the ill-grace to withhold any part of it.

In view of the apprehended failure of the House tariff bill, the chief purpose of the Senator's long and elaborate speech was to say to the House what Lady Macbeth said to her doubting and slow-going husband:

> But screw your courage to the sticking-place,
> And we'll not fail.

The Senator was very pronounced, even expert, as the ostentatious and self-constituted whip, at long range, of the other branch of Congress, but whether or not that branch will accept with meekness and docility the discipline so vigorously administered remains to be seen. He served this rather stinging notice upon those "who think they are Democrats:"

Men who think—

Said he—

they are Democrats, and take the position that the Senators from Vermont and Ohio do, will find but little comfort inside of the Democratic camp after the national convention meets.

And he further politely told them that "sneaks and cowards never command respect."

This means business. When the Senator from Kentucky holds the whip he always means business; and in a few days I fear some parties will be hurt; in fact some have already been hurt, and now "find but little comfort inside of the Democratic camp." Diogenes was banished from Sinope, but he is said to have retaliated by condemning his prosecutors to remain in Sinope. Which was the severest sentence the world has ever been in doubt, and it may be, after the Democratic camp has been purged of all those who do not take the position of the Senator from Kentucky, that those who remain "will find but little comfort."

The Senator dismisses old partners in a hundred battles to oblivion and silence, as though he had all majorities at his "beck and will," and then proposes at the national convention to seize the political rudder and guide the ship of state with but one rag of bunting flying, on which shall be inscribed the legend, "Kentucky only."

Senators will acquit me from having ever exhibited a willingness to make a party issue of the tariff question, which, being so interwoven with the general welfare of every portion of our country, I have been reluctant to appropriate, even its apparent advantages; but if our Democratic opponents, bidding adieu to their earlier platforms and to the teachings of their ancient and most renowned leaders, choose to thrust this new issue upon us, they may rest assured that the conflict will not be shunned, and that it may require all their reserves except in Kentucky, a State which may not seek the felicity in this contest of furnishing its full quota of combatants on both sides.

Last year a revision of the tariff was made, largely guided by the aid of a most intelligent commission previously authorized by Congress, and yet before this revision has been in practical operation beyond a fraction of one year, with results yet unascertained and unascertainable, it is slandered, passionately denounced, and the purpose earnestly proclaimed by the latest official organs of a great political party to make a sweeping and indiscriminate reduction of the tariff, applicable, right or wrong, to the great bulk of foreign imports. This is to be done ostensibly with a view to reduce the amount of revenues, and yet its advocates contend, or have contended, that revenues would be increased by a reduction of duties and the consequent opening of the doors to wider importations.

It is not to be done because American industries are in a prosperous condition and ready to suddenly meet greater foreign competition, for we have not wholly escaped the universal depression of business and trade which now vexes the whole world, but it is to be done, as boldly announced by sound of trumpet and bagpipe, to lift from an extreme exigency a political party, now for many years lacking the confidence of the country, a party which twenty-odd years ago was weighed in the balance, found wanting, and went out of power for reasons not needful to state, but which would now return to power by a general warfare against the entire home industries of the country.

The declaration without reserve is further made that what is now proposed is but an installment or the first step in the war, and that other far-reaching and more destructive campaigns are to follow. Should the war come up to the Democratic manifesto we may bid adieu to all new enterprises and those in existence may at once prepare their windingsheets. The bane of American manufactures, resulting in untold losses, has too often been the lack of stability or the unending succession of new tariff laws, ever making capital distrustful and labor hopeless. The defects of tariffs doubtless sometimes require to be cured; and last year an appropriate remedy to our revenue laws was applied, as was believed; but before we are made certain of the healthful effects of the medicine thus administered it is proposed by some doctors, suspected even by their friends to be quacks, to administer a horizontal dose of the "queer," or a dose to give everybody a foretaste of free trade; and we need not wait to know what must be its effects, as it would hardly be less than general disaster, if not ruin, to the productive and business interests of the American people.

Our own experience proves that the experiment of a blind horizontal reduction of the tariff is not only dangerous but intolerable. The country, whenever it has been tried, has not endured it and will not. To justify a change in the tariff the benefits should be large and substantial, and certainly not capricious or partisan. It will hardly do to trust such changes to those who pay no deference to usage, no favor to labor or to invested capital, and who see no difficulties in any of the problems of government, but fancy that a just and well-arranged tariff can be evoked in five minutes by the stroke of a pen.

It has been proposed to take off 20 per cent. of the existing tariff upon every article from head to foot, luxuries as well as necessaries, with such exceptions as may have been found expedient to offer for a much-wanted vote, but going skin-deep everywhere and cutting to the bone in many tender places, in order to resurrect an old party and give it a new character, furnished with a new political catechism, as though its House of Representatives would not shipwreck even a new and the best character by its misdeeds before the end of the first session of its official career. The burden will lie heavily upon those who are seeking to bleed, more or less, every industry of the country, before the wounds of last year's tariff reductions are yet healed, to give some better reasons than have yet appeared for such a universal disturbance of labor and of capital.

This horizontal 20 per cent. experiment was made in 1857, and at once became one of the potential reasons for the tariff of 1861. It was again tried at half the rate, or 10 per cent., in June, 1872, and was quickly repealed, or restored, in March, 1875. The method is that of the guillotine, and has nothing to recommend it but its brevity. No one but Doctor Sangrado, who practiced blood-letting for all ailments, could give it his approval. Even the "revenue-only" inspired Senator from Kentucky, in his speech the other day, made this truthful and touching confession, and I want to give him this credit, perhaps my only chance, for it was the rarest gem in the speech. Said he:

> I admit that we have not been able to present a very satisfactory bill for relief from tariff taxation in the House of Representatives.

No; about as "satisfactory" as the jug of horse-medicine Sancho Panza mistook for old Jamaica, but, like Sancho, the Senator appears to have a well-drilled appetite, and is very earnest that the House shall take it without wincing.

It is now loudly proclaimed by leading Democrats that they must seize upon the tariff question and offer "a tariff for revenue only" as the great political issue or the only St. Jacob's oil with which to conquer, because they have nothing else. This is at least a confession that upon all other matters the Republican administration deserves well of the country, and that there is no other vulnerable point open to attack. Before I get through I shall endeavor to show that the doctrines and traditions of the Democratic party were not always in harmony with this platform, which claims its sire in Kentucky, and its dam will be likely to be found in some other State.

The Democratic party have always claimed that they have controlled the United States Government for the most part of the time during the first seventy years of its history. But all the Presidents, without exception, up to and including President Jackson, concurred in the general tone of encouragement and protection to those who should embark their capital and labor in manufactures. Even just prior to a second election General Jackson was not tempted to say a "tariff for revenue only," but still clung to his idea of a "judicious tariff." Mr. Dallas, in his report on the tariff of 1816, said:

> There are few if any governments which do not regard the establishment of domestic manufactures as a chief object of public policy. The United States have always so regarded it.

It is a significant fact during the earlier days of the Republic that the Committee on Manufactures in the House of Representatives had charge of tariff bills, conclusively showing that protection was a leading and prominent object, and confirming the parliamentary axiom that "the child is not to be put to a nurse that cares not for it." The Committee on Manufactures, by a resolution of the House December 28, 1827, asked and obtained power to send for persons and papers, "to enable them to determine with certainty and precision the true condition of those interests, and more especially of those manufacturing interests, which had preferred claims for protection to the national Legislature."

After receiving a large amount of testimony under oath the tariff bill was presented March 4, 1828, by Rollin C. Mallary, of Vermont, chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, accompanied by a report written by Silas Wright, jr., of New York, a man whose fame, though he would not take the second place on the Presidential ticket with Mr. Polk, has no second place among the Democrats of that great State, even when challenged by a later generation. Such men as he lent a dignity and independence to the nation which we might not be able to supplement among those who by their commercial policy would reannex America, as another prostrate Ireland, to the British Empire, and thus reduce the national prestige to the rank of a second-class power.

The tariff bill of 1828, with compound duties, with specifics, with square yard and minimum duties, and all those grim protective features, now more irritating to the sensitive nerves of the "revenue-only" clan than would be even a Scotch thistle, became a law, when there was a Democratic majority in both Houses of Congress, by the votes of such eminent Jacksonian Democrats as James K. Polk, Dutee J. Pearce, James Buchanan, Silas Wright, jr., Joel Yancey, Martin Van Buren, Thomas H. Benton, and Richard M. Johnson. These old full-orbed luminaries would now pale their "uneffectual fire" in the face of the primacy of the modern transcendent lights of free trade, who now threaten trembling non-conformists with excommunication—possibly a bigger bull than their latest tariff bill.

The old-line Democrats, and I was trained in that faith, legitimately following Henry Clay, would no more have been expected to separate themselves from a protective tariff than that the earth itself should be divorced from the solar system. It is the cardinal principle of that humane statesmanship which enables men to earn more and live better and cheaper. It is the only policy which can make agricultural pursuits permanently remunerative. It is that system which largely increases the aggregate productions of manufactures and makes them, therefore, of less price to the whole world. It diversifies employments, giving to the strong and the weak of both sexes greater opportunities for earning a livelihood, as well as for increasing their general knowledge. It offers a premium to skill and intelligence, and promotes all of the useful arts.

There appears to be a sudden disposition upon the part of the new chieftains, I will not say bosses, of the Democratic party to throw overboard any Pennsylvania or other Democrat of the old regulation pattern. Vice-President Dallas, whose name once sweetened a Democratic ticket heralded with the strange device of "Polk, Dallas, and the tariff of 1842," would now be told in a Democratic caucus of to-day to take his "grip-sack" and be off with himself. President Buchanan, a life-long Jacksonian-protective-tariff Democrat, full of honors conferred by the Democratic party, crowned his political life by giving his Presidential signature on the 3d of March, 1861, to what has sometimes been called the Morrill tariff.

The distinguished Senator from Kentucky looks forward with exultation to the platform which the national Democratic convention at Chicago will adopt. "Adopt" is the proper word, for it is supposed to be already made in Kentucky, where all bourbon manufactures can be cunningly reproduced in the greatest old-régime perfection; and it is as thoroughly seasoned as could be expected after a bonded ripening of eight years. The Senator of course expects this platform to be of the Kentucky-only patent pattern. But what if Virginia should insist upon a tincture of iron? Or what if California or Florida should stick on having some show in the timber? Or what if Louisiana should refuse to swallow it without a lump of sugar? Or what if Ohio, with a lamb-like utterance, should denounce the "Kentucky-only" platform as swinish, and "all cry and no wool"?

But the Democratic party has been an industrious as well as a versatile architect in the construction of platforms, calculated, like the old Farmers' Almanac, for the meridian of Lexington, but expected to answer for the surrounding country. They have been of different orders as the fashion of the times demanded. Sometimes the Doric, and then the Renaissance; sometimes Corinthian, and again the Queen Anne style; but all, like my distinguished friend's speeches, very miscellaneous, composite, and affluent in misrepresentation. If the Senator from Kentucky can fix up the fashion and foretell what pieces of hard and soft timber, of leather and prunella, will be dovetailed together at Chicago, whether it will be a fish or a rooster or how long it will last, he will have established his fame as high as any of the noblest figures which announce the direction of the wind from our tallest steeples.

The new platforms of Democratic national conventions must hereafter receive attention, however little consideration has been bestowed upon their previously buried offspring. The rumbling thunder of the speech of the Senator from Kentucky delivered on the third instant operated as loud explosions are always said to upon deceased bodies in the deep waters of the sea, and has brought to the surface the ghastly forms of the dead and sunken platforms of former days. Notwithstanding the "ancient and fishlike" odor of which their decayed condition may furnish a hint, I hope to be excused if I venture to ask that these once loved relics shall not be wholly neglected by their surviving relatives and friends.

Lest it should be supposed that I am not speaking by the book of this classic branch of Democratic literature, I shall present some extracts showing the quadrennial devotion of the Democratic party to inconsistency, never failing to court the latest popular breeze, believing that—

> Except wind stands as never it stood,
> It is an ill wind turns none to good.

The Republican platform adopted by the Congressional caucus in 1800—and the Democratic party now claims that it then bore the name of Republican—contained as one of its planks the following:

> Encouragement of science and the arts in all their branches, to the end that the American people may perfect their independence of all foreign monopolies, institutions, and influences.

This was a very broad and explicit indorsement of the principle of encouragement "of the arts in all their branches," and "of universal independence of all foreign monopolies." Before I get through it will be seen that the times change and Kentucky changes with them, but so much the worse for Kentucky.

I have found no record of a national Democratic platform again until 1836, when the Declaration of Independence, that all men were born free and equal, appears to have been adopted without any serious opposition, though twenty years later its author was widely denounced as a visionary philosopher, uttering "glittering generalities," and not a word about the tariff; but a further solemn declaration was made of "unqualified hostility to bank notes and paper money as a circulating medium, because gold and silver is the only safe constitutional currency." That doctrine as an article of unqualified Democratic faith seems to have lost its sweet-smelling savor, and now the illicit miscegenation of the Democratic party with the Greenback and paper-money race has become so widespread and ineradicable that it has obtained some sanction through the war powers of the Supreme Court. It may be observed that Democratic national platforms are perhaps intended to be good only for each season or until after the election, and, like cheap through railroad tickets, are destitute of holdover advantages.

In 1840 the Democratic platform set forth—

> That the Constitution does not confer upon the General Government the power to commence and carry on a general system of internal improvement.

This resolution was again and again repeated, though in the face of it the Illinois Central Railroad, with many other railroads, through Democratic support, received immense subsidies in land. Finally, in 1860, both the Douglas and Breckinridge wings of the Democratic party declared that—

> The Democratic party pledge such constitutional government aid as will insure the construction of a railroad to the Pacific coast at the earliest practicable period.

This being special—only reaching across the continent, and not belonging to a general system of internal improvements—had to be reckoned constitutional; but how is it to be reconciled now to pretended Democratic hostility to corporations and monopolies?

In 1872 the party declared: "We are opposed to all further grants of lands to railroads or other corporations," and now appears to be undetermined whether or not to withhold even what has been granted.

In 1840 it would seem that the Democratic party was not so rigid in its discipline and tolerated some differences of opinion, and therefore resolved not to nominate any one for Vice-President on the ticket with Van Buren, because there was a "diversity of opinion." At this time Democratic platforms contained nothing about the tariff, or nothing more than general platitudes which might be accepted by anybody, as in 1844, when "the reoccupation of Oregon and the annexation of Texas" were the great American measures.

In 1852 the fundamental idea announced was, "That the Democratic party will faithfully abide by and uphold the principles in the Kentucky and Virginia resolutions of 1798 and 1799." This they again solemnly repeated in 1856, and also resolved to hold sacred the principles of the Monroe doctrine. It is a subject of profound gratification to find that the party hold anything as sacred. It is to be feared that they generally adhere to the profane.

In 1860 the platform of both wings of the party contained this resolution, namely:

> That the Democratic party are in favor of the acquisition of the Island of Cuba on such terms as shall be honorable to ourselves and just to Spain.

That is to say, the party no longer supported the filibuster General Lopez, but was willing to give millions in money to Spain for Cuba and its slaves.

And the Douglas wing was willing to leave the question of slavery in the Territories to the Supreme Court, but the Breckinridge wing wanted outright the privilege to take their slaves with them to the Territories.

In 1864 the Democratic platform set forth that "after four years of failure to restore the Union by the experiment of war" they demanded "that immediate efforts be made for a cessation of hostilities." I think they have always been sorry that they said that.

In 1868 their platform demanded the "payment of the public debt of the United States as rapidly as practicable," and also that "when the obligations of the Government do not expressly state on their face, or the law under which they were issued does not provide, that they shall be paid in coin, they ought in right and in justice to be paid in lawful money of the United States." Here they abandoned gold and silver and wanted the public debt to be paid in paper money. And the sixth resolution of the platform demanded "a tariff for revenue upon foreign imports, and such equal taxation under the internal-revenue laws as will afford incidental protection to domestic manufactures, and as will, without impairing the revenue, impose the least burden upon and best promote and encourage the great industrial interests of the country."

From this lucid explanation of the great principles of the Democratic party it is now plain that internal-revenue taxation is to be forever maintained—if they stick to the resolution of 1868—in order to afford incidental protection to domestic manufactures.

In 1872 the national Democratic platform contained the following words:

> That there are in our midst honest but irreconcilable differences of opinion with regard to the respective systems of protection and free trade; we remit the discussion of the subject to the people in their Congressional districts and the decision of Congress thereon, wholly free from executive interference or dictation.

They no longer admit that "irreconcilable differences" can now be "honest."

In 1876 the party put forth their declaration for "a tariff for revenue only," and in 1880 they made an important change, saying: "We demand that all custom-house taxation shall be only for revenue." The order and sequence of the three pivotal words "for revenue only" or "only for revenue" make all the difference as to which is the head and which the tail, or whether "revenue" wags "only" or "only" wags "revenue." It would seem that the Presidential Democratic candidate at the last election failed to find out; but, being perhaps in favor of "local option" as to the liquor traffic, finally decided that the tariff was also a local-option question.

The straight-out Democratic national platform at Louisville, in 1872, could not indorse Mr. Greeley, but went far to conciliate its protective-tariff brethern by the following:

> Resolved, That the interests of labor and capital should not be permitted to conflict, but should be harmonized by judicious legislation. While such a conflict continues, labor, which is the parent of wealth, is entitled to paramount consideration.

Even Horace Greeley might have been content with this very tender resolution, and would not have spit on this part of the straight-out platform.

The Democratic platform of 1876 declared their confidence in "republican self-government"—strange as it may seem—and "in the faithful education of the rising generation—that they may preserve, enjoy, and transmit these best conditions of human happiness and hope—we behold the noblest products of a hundred years of changeful history."

This was rather effusive, but must be construed to mean that the nation has some duty in relation to "the faithful education of the rising generation;" if so, it was rather strange that the recognized leaders here of the Democratic party gave so little heed to this article of their faith in their speeches and votes upon the educational bill which recently passed the Senate. I fear they are heretics and may not long enjoy comfort in the Democratic camp.

With this very abundant historical evidence of the utter untrustworthiness of the modern Democratic party to construct past national platforms, what can be expected from any new fabrication? The confidence of the people is not likely to be won by the only journeymen now employed.

A fruitful theme of ill-informed comment has been the supposed discrepancy between what appears to be the amount of the reduction of the revenue under the tariff of 1883 and the amount as previously estimated. This comment is based upon the importations of a fraction, or the first half, of the year, when no accuracy is possible, for the reason of the permanent difference in the general character and description of the merchandise imported in the first half of the year from that which must be imported in the last half of the year.

These importations also change from year to year, as may be seen from the years 1876 to 1883, inclusive, when there was but one change in the tariff, that on cinchona, utterly insignificant in amount; and yet the variation in the amount of revenue and of the ad valorem rates of duty on the total imports for each fiscal year were constant, and often larger than what has been erroneously represented for the first half of the present year compared with the year previous. To compare the results of one tariff with another can only be done where the imports are precisely the same with the same classifications; but the imports are never the same, and the classification of the late tariff in some instances was changed by placing a lower rate of duty on common descriptions of manufactures and a higher rate upon finer and more luxurious descriptions. Still even a brief examination of the imports for nine months of the present fiscal year will show that the figures which have been formally paraded as the results of the first six months of the existing tariff are fatally unreliable, and that the reduction of the rates of duty has been many times greater than what it has been erroneously and persistently represented.

The estimated reduction of receipts by the change of the rates of duty on sugar was $15,000,000, and the estimate was based on the nominal reduction of rates, without taking into account any gain or increase from the application of the polariscopic test to the actual amount of saccharine strength in the classification of imported sugars. It now turns out that the polariscope has recovered nearly every dollar of revenue that was supposed to have been surrendered by the apparent reduction of the rates fixed upon sugar. I am quite ready to confess that, for one, I did not take this very efficient fraud-detector into any estimate of mine, and it only shows the magnitude of the evasions so successfully practiced under former tariffs, and which all the vigor of the Secretary of the Treasury could not wholly overcome.

Under the tariff of 1883 an item of great importance, but which cuts no figure in public discussion, was the provision by which all charges of fees and commissions, as well as all cost of inland transportation, should no longer be added to the cost of imported merchandise. Of course this permits all merchandise subject to ad valorem duties to be put upon our markets at a considerable reduction of cost, and still may leave the apparent rate of duty higher than before this very important change was made.

The almost universal undervaluation of imported merchandise, if we may give any credit to the long detailed statements of the Secretary of the Treasury, is another sickening element of uncertainty in all statistics relative to custom-house revenues.

In any consideration of the tariff of 1883 and of its reductions there is a further important fact to be taken into the account, and that is the large number of articles which were made free and wholly exempted from duty. In order to form a just and proper judgment as to what was really effected by the work done on the tariff last year I have had the very competent clerk of the Committee on Finance furnish me with a list of the changes made, showing the increase or decrease of the rates of duty upon 775 of the about 1,100 items which it is supposed are embraced in the tariff. Of these 775 items, 63 have been taken from the dutiable and put upon the free list; and of the remaining 712 items, only upon 75 has there been any increase of duties.

This increase is generally very slight, except the increase upon champagne and other wines, which, though specific, would add much to any general computation of an ad valorem rate of duties, and also very largely increase the amount of revenue. This increase was made on motion of a Democratic Senator and unanimously agreed to in the Senate. From this statement the important fact appears that in the late revision, out of 1,100 items embraced in the tariff, more than half of the whole, or 637, were subjected to positive reduction, and 63 more were entirely exempted from duty. These absolute reductions vary from 5 to 40 per cent. on every one of this long list of articles, and they stand like a phalanx to dispute the flippant assertions of unblushing partisans that no appreciable reductions have been made, and should satisfy all reasonable men that the revision was honestly, intelligently, and faithfully made.

If, as falsely claimed, there has been a large advance made by the act of 1883 of the duties on manufactures of wool, the data at hand do not show any appreciable falling off in the importations of woolen goods, which must of course follow from such an increase of rates.

At an early day after the adjournment of the present Congress, not too long a time to test the existing tariff, if it shall appear that we are giving to the Treasury too much revenue, I trust that it will be then promptly reduced; but I also hope that any such reduction will be conducted by friends, and not by those who would slaughter the great industries of the country and put the wages of labor here upon the level of those received by people who are compelled to support not only large standing armies, but also to support large standing aristocracies.

The statement of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, quoted by the Senator from Kentucky, so far as it relates to wool and woolens, is wholly misleading, and can not be accepted or used as a just comparison of the old and new tariff or of the results of the act of March 3, 1883, on these articles. The average foreign value of wools of the first and second classes has remained practically unchanged; and as the duty is now wholly specific, the decrease shown on estimated ad valorem rates is, therefore, very nearly equivalent to the actual removal of the 10 and 11 per cent. ad valorem made by the bill.

The present duty on wools costing 30 cents per pound is, for unwashed, 10 cents per pound; washed, 20 cents per pound; and for scoured, 30 cents per pound. For wool over 30 cents per pound, unwashed, 12 cents per pound; washed, 24 cents per pound; and scoured 36 cents per pound. On the other hand, the duty on woolens is a mixed or compound duty, and the resulting ad valorem rates depend on changes in foreign values of the goods. These values are considerably less in 1883 than for the period with which the comparison has been made in 1882, and they have been still further reduced by persistent and fraudulent undervaluations. These natural and artificial reductions have apparently increased the ad valorem rates, when if the estimates could have been made on the basis of values of 1882 a larger decrease of the rates would have been clearly shown on woolens than on wool. It is not necessary, however, to consider any hypothetical conditions, as an inspection of the law discloses the fact that the reduction in rates on manufactures of wool is greater than on wool. If, however, it shall be found that the wool-growers of our country need and can be benefited by any proper amendment of the tariff, it will have my cordial support.

The following statement, presented to the Committee of Ways and Means in March, 1884, shows the amount of reduction on woolen manufactures in a general way as effected by the act of March 3, 1883:

On flannels, blankets, knit goods, woolen and worsted yarns, manufactures of worsted, &c., valued at not exceeding 30 cents per pound, from 32.78 to 34.78 per cent.
Valued at above 30 cents per pound and not exceeding 40 cents per pound, 25.93 to 29.41 per cent.
Valued at above 40 cents per pound and not exceeding 60 cents per pound, 23.53 to 27.06 per cent.
Valued at above 60 cents per pound and not exceeding 80 cents per pound, from 23.53 to 26.08 per cent.
Valued at above 80 cents per pound, the reduction ranges from 13.97 per cent. on goods valued at 81 cents, to 7.31 per cent. on goods valued at $1.50 per pound.
On woolen cloth, worsted shawls, &c.—
Valued at not exceeding 80 cents per pound, it ranges from 20.13 per cent. on goods valued at 70 cents to 24.80 per cent. on goods valued at 30 cents per pound.
On finer and higher-priced goods valued at exceeding 80 cents per pound it ranges from 7.31 per cent. on goods valued at $1.50 to 13.97 per cent. on goods valued at 81 cents per pound.

These reductions are all exclusive of the reduction produced by the abolition of the duty on charges and commissions, which is fully equal to a reduction of 2½ per cent.

| Reduction in specific rate on— | Per cent. |
|---|---|
| All manufactures of wool, not otherwise specified: | |
| Not exceeding 80 cents per pound | 30 |
| Exceeding 80 cents per pound | 30 |
| Bunting | 50 |
| Cloaks, dolmans, talmas, ulsters, and other outside garments for ladies' and children's apparel | 10 |
| Clothing, ready-made, and wearing apparel, not otherwise provided for, and skirts and skirting | 20 |
| Cloths, woolen shawls: | |
| Valued at not exceeding 80 cents per pound | 30 |
| Valued at exceeding 80 cents per pound | 30 |
| Dress goods, coat linings, Italian cloths, and similar goods: | |
| Valued at 20 cents per yard | 16 |
| Valued at above 20 cents per yard | 12½ |
| Weighing over 4 ounces to yard | 30 |
| Flannels, blankets, hats of wool, knit goods: | |
| Valued at not exceeding 30 cents per pound | 50 |
| Valued at above 30 and under 40 | 40 |
| Valued at above 40 and under 60 | 40 |
| Valued at above 60 and under 80 | 40 |
| Valued at above 80 | 30 |
| Webbings of wool of all kinds | 40 |

These are the unimpeachable facts of the record, and certainly show a very liberal reduction in all the specific rates upon woolen goods.

Manufactures give employment to a great multitude of persons, widely distribute the expenditures, and enrich with their broadcast fertilization whole communities; but, with the capital very largely contributed and owned in small parcels, they do not often add to the number of millionaires. The importation of foreign merchandise, on the contrary, laudable as it may be, should not receive excessive favor and encouragement, because it does build up colossal fortunes and makes no distribution of its profits save among limited numbers and exclusively at the ports on the shore where imports are landed.

New York is a wondrous city, and contains very many worthy men who have made princely fortunes in foreign trade. These men, to whom the whole interior country have always been tributary, are never brought into contract with another far greater number of artificers, the men who labor with their hands, though they live in the same city. The dwellers on Fifth avenue know no more of those who live down town in flats and cellars than they do of their country cousins. And yet these artificers and workmen, according to the census of 1880, produced of manufactured commodities in the city of New York, and the annex of Mr. Beecher, sometimes called Brooklyn, the astonishing amount in value of $650,149,579; while the total amount of merchandise imported the same year throughout the whole United States was no more, all told, than $650,149,579. Strange to say, the business of the latter mo-nopolizes the chief attention, but all the toil represented by the former is by the world forgot. Still the world moves on, and it appears, even within the two cities referred to, that manufactures are produced of scarcely less magnitude than the entire foreign import trade of our whole country.

The number of persons employed in manufactures in New York and Brooklyn in 1880 was 274,939. It would be entirely fair to say that at least two more persons were wholly dependent upon each of these for their support. That will demonstrate that 824,817 of the population of these cities have a vital interest in manufactures and the tariff, but their voices are silent among the "upper ten thousand," and the importers are solidly represented here for free trade,

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury, April 1, 1884, to the House of Representatives furnishes conclusive evidence (in addition to the undervaluation of wool) of general and extensive undervaluation of imported merchandise when subject to ad valorem duties. He says:

> The honest American merchant is precluded from importing lines of goods thus undervalued.
> It thus happens that when Congress enacts that the rates of duty on certain goods shall be 50 per cent. ad valorem it is found that perhaps only 30 or 40 per cent. is actually paid, according to the boldness and skill of the shipper and his American agent in falsifying market values and deceiving the appraising officers.

This is the way in which fortunes are made in the foreign trade. These are the men who contribute money for the distribution of free-trade tracts. Whether by regular orders or by a system of consignments they effectually control the bulk of the trade, and native American merchants find it impossible to compete with them.

And yet the would-be free-traders of New York with their revenue-reform clubs, their dependent newspapers, and their great wealth assume to revolutionize the industrial policy of the nation and make it subservient to their exclusive aggrandizement. This may find a responsive echo in Kentucky, but it will not among the workingmen of New York city, much less of the Empire State.

It may be well to remember that 75 per cent. of the importing business of New York is carried on by foreigners, a large part of whom are aliens, who never intend to become citizens.

Any country solely dependent upon agriculture will forever remain comparatively sparsely inhabited and be blessed with only limited fortunes. Look at Turkey and Egypt. They are destitute of manufactures, without wealth, and are destined to be the prey of the strongest naval or military power, notwithstanding that their territories are easily defensible and that their people have the courage and religious fanaticism which naturally produce the most formidable soldiers of the world. To these countries we might add others, like Ireland, India, and Poland, with all their labor confined to the soil and their trade monopolized by imperial powers. How poor they are all the world knows and sadly regrets. The Republic of Switzerland, on the contrary, mountainous and sterile, is begemmed with manufactories, and, though surrounded upon all sides by ambitious nations which often wage wars of aggrandizement, yet Switzerland, brave, honest, and industrious, maintains forever the independence of her people and the ownership of their mountain homes.

Would the land of gallant Poles ever have been subjugated and distributed by the Holy Alliance had they been anything more than a purely agricultural people? Let us confess that the late rebellion in the South of eleven States, occupying a territory nearly twice as large as that of the other twenty-four, would not have been put down, even so soon as four years, had there been no difference in the trained industrial skill of the respective sections by which the superiority to repair and restore the wide waste of war was found on the side of the Union armies. It should be added that this difference with the disappearance of slavery is also rapidly disappearing, as are other differences. There are no controversial abstractions which now prevent a region abundantly supplied with raw material, with immense coal-fields, inexhaustible mineral resources, and a whole race of laborers waiting to be employed, from as prosperous a career as awaits any other portion of the Union or of the world.

Our farmers are always dependent upon the home market for not less than 92 per cent. of their products, and it is very rarely that there is a foreign market for even so much as 8 per cent. of their products; and this foreign demand is uncertain and most likely in the future to be diminished. In 1880 our exports of bread and breadstuffs, the largest we ever had, amounted to $288,036,835, but in 1882 they fell off over $100,000,000, and amounted in 1869 to only $53,724,154. Sometimes the exports have been even much less. The exports of provisions are subject to similar fluctuations. In 1881 they were large and amounted to $151,528,268, but fell off in 1883 to $107,388,287. These exports, it will be seen, are wholly unstable and unreliable, and no foreign demand occurs save when we are compelled to undersell the whole world.

The production of wheat in India and Australia is already enormous and is rapidly increasing. Great Britain is almost the only nation whose consumption largely exceeds its own production. The acreage of British India open to wheat culture is nearly illimitable, and Great Britain is bending every effort, by cheaper transportation through the Suez Canal, to obtain her chief supplies within her own empire. For the long future the prospect of a foreign market for the products of the American farmer is by no means bright, and yet a constant and large increase of these home products of our farmers appears inevitable. With any such increase, and with no corresponding increase of demand at home or abroad, prices here must year by year tend downward.

The price of wheat in Chicago to-day is less than 80 cents a bushel, or at the lowest point ever reached for many years. The farmer's hope, therefore, and sole permanent reliance, is upon building up a greater and surer home market, by inducing larger numbers to find employment in manufactures, and thus to become regular consumers of agricultural products. If this is prevented by any "revenue-only" policy the prosperous days of agriculture in America are over, and the farmers will work hard and receive only half or two-thirds as much for whatever they have to sell as they have heretofore received. In America it is only the men who do not labor themselves who advocate the free-trade or revenue-only policy. Adam Smith, in his Wealth of Nations, declares that—

> Whatever besides tends to diminish in any country the number of artificers and manufacturers tends to diminish the home market, the most important of all markets, for the rude products of land, and thereby to discourage agriculture.

Other high authorities declare that capital carefully employed in manufactures by an agricultural nation increases in time the value of the soil tenfold. That there is much truth in these statements appears from a table published in a pamphlet of the Department of Agriculture giving a statement of the local variation of prices of farm lands in different States, comparing manufacturing counties with agricultural counties. By this (see Table A) it is shown that land in California is worth three times as much per acre in the manufacturing as in the agricultural counties. Land in the one manufacturing county in the State of Delaware is valued at an average of $73.87 per acre, but in the other two counties it is valued at only $21.56 per acre.

In West Virginia land is valued in manufacturing counties at $48.87 per acre, but only at $12.18 in other counties. In Ohio manufactures decorate almost all parts of the State with thriving towns and villages, and land is valued high: but here, in what may be called specially manufacturing counties, it is valued at $67.85 per acre, and in other counties at $42.46. In Kentucky land is valued in manufacturing counties at $36.48 per acre, but at only $12.14 per acre in other counties. In Minnesota, Connecticut, Georgia, and other States land is valued in manufacturing counties at not less than double what it is worth in other counties.

Nearly all of the improved land in this country is cultivated by its resident owners, and they will not be slow to perceive the advantages which manufactures afford by increasing the value of their estates. Kentucky has only to look across the Ohio to be convinced of these stubborn facts.

It is no crime for men or a whole people to change their opinions, though it is possible that the change may be to their own hurt. The opinions of the Marshalls and of Crittenden were once of high authority in Kentucky, and those of Clay were talismanic as well as continental in their reach. These renowned statesmen did not propagate the dry-as-dust doctrines of free trade, nor its equivalent to be found in the fleshless bones of a "tariff for revenue only," but a tariff which would promote home industries and preserve the fat of the land for their own people. This was the American system for which Henry Clay eloquently contended and fondly hoped to see adopted, not only by Kentucky but by the whole country.

Is it not time for Kentucky to reconsider the question and find out whether she has not made a mistake in turning aside from the policy and the lead of the great men who once adorned her history? If the true destiny of the State, to which her most distinguished sons once pointed the way, has been restrained and dwarfed by the dogmas of a foreign and hostile school, I have no doubt that her great men of to-day, and they are now here, would willingly obey her mandate, accept of any new revelation as to what is just and expedient, and do their best to sustain a policy which would be likely to develop the abundant natural resources of their noble State, which have unfortunately so long remained untouched.

My respect for Old Kentucky is too great to allow me to utter anything which would wound her sensibilities, though I would not let her people sleep while others seem to be distancing her in every decennial race; and I may be permitted even to ask Kentucky, with a soil, minerals, climate, and water courses unsurpassed, to look at her northern sister State of little more than equal size, and inquire how it is that Ohio appears in the census returns so much the greater State in both agriculture and manufactures if it is not that Ohio has extended a more practical hospitality to manufactures? The population of these States in 1820 was nearly equal.

In 1880 the farms in Kentucky amounted to 21,495,240 acres, and in Ohio to 24,529,226 acres, giving an advantage of only about 15 per cent. to Ohio; but the value of farm products sold, consumed, or on hand was in Ohio $156,777,152, while in Kentucky the value was no more than $63,850,155, and the value of the farms was almost four times greater in Ohio than in Kentucky. I will append a table (see Table B) which will show the productions of each State, by which it will be seen that Ohio produced 50 per cent. more corn than Kentucky, four times as much wheat, six times as much of oats, four times as much of potatoes, and more than five times as much wool. Ohio had also more swine, twice as many cows and horses, and vastly greater dairy products.

But it is true, as will be seen by the table, that Kentucky produced a little more, and perhaps better, distilled spirits than Ohio, and almost five times as much tobacco. This exhibit as a whole, however, ought not to fully satisfy Kentucky, and it is far from being compensated by her $75,483,377 only of manufactures when compared with the $348,298,390 of manufactures produced in Ohio. The Mammoth Cave is one of the great curiosities of the world, but Kentucky should point with pride to something besides the works of nature, and, instead of urging an economical policy that will drag down Ohio, should urge that other more noble and beneficent policy which will elevate Kentucky to an equal splendor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). The Senator from Vermont will suspend his remarks. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. BECK. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the Senator from Vermont be allowed to conclude his remarks before the regular order is taken up.

Mr. MORRILL. I am much obliged to my friend from Kentucky.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the Senator from Vermont be allowed to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. HOAR. Leaving the regular order in its place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And that the regular order be proceeded with at the conclusion of his remarks. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Vermont will proceed.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator from Kentucky grows indignant upon the question of keeping up war taxes in time of peace, and would seem to indicate that the interest on the war debt and pensions of Union soldiers can hereafter be paid without war taxes. It would be more pertinent to probe the question as to what party had made war taxes permanently necessary.

The Senator indicates if his theory of a tariff shall be adopted that a demand will soon be made "that a part of the necessary revenue of the Government shall be raised by a tax on incomes." This, of course, is the auxiliary force which is to be summoned to help out the revenue-only policy. Let his allies take notice of the banquet to which they are to be invited.

The Senator boldly claims that the $64,000,000 of taxes so properly levied on raw cotton should be returned to the South, and does not seem to be aware that a report of the Treasury long ago showed that little or none of this sum was ever paid by the South, and that if it were to be returned nearly every dollar of it would go into the pockets of Northern men in Northern States.

The Senator also reiterates his stereotyped assertion that "every dollar it is proposed to donate cost the labor of the country $5 before it reached the Treasury." Of course he means that every dollar collected by a protective tariff costs $5. This is refuted by the judgment of the whole world, as shown by their adherence to the general tariff system. There is not a boy in his teens that will be deceived by the statement.

The Senator for the fifth or sixth time repeats the words that "the blanket worth $1 pays the same (duty) as that worth $5." He will not see that he is wrong in his facts, nor will he find out that blankets are sold here at as low a price as anywhere in the world. He has got his tongue attuned to these words, and when he puts it in motion he can go off and leave it, feeling sure that the same words will come forth. As one of his friends told me, "he seems to think he has found (in a blanket) a thing of beauty which is a joy forever."

The Senator very stoutly asserts "that if Mr. Tilden had been allowed to take his seat the tariff would have been promptly reformed on a revenue basis."

To show how strangely the Senator misrepresents Mr. Tilden it is only necessary to cite what General John B. Gordon, after a call upon him, sets forth as the real position of Mr. Tilden. General Gordon says: "Mr. Tilden favored Mr. Payne as the most available man, but expressed the opinion that he, too, would decline to run. * * * He [Mr. Tilden] objected strongly to making the tariff the leading issue of the campaign, insisting that the true policy of the Democrats was comprehended in the general term of reform." It is significant that Mr. Tilden's favorite candidate is Mr. Payne, an Ohio protective-tariff Democrat, and that he is also for keeping quite dark on the tariff as a leading issue.

A tariff with incidental protection is a legitimate child of the fathers of the Republic, nursed and maintained by the principles of urgent expediency, recognized and enforced by the great leaders of American institutions, when all state protection was to be superseded, as incontestably constitutional, and has resulted in the achievement of a national prosperity and growth by the useful arts of peace unexampled in the history of the human race.

It is sometimes claimed that this child, though having a constitutional and lawful birth, has now reached the age of maturity, when it should wrestle with and pit itself against the world, and is entitled to no further favors from its own family and home. Let it, however, be remembered that we started from the date when we were not permitted by colonial masters to make even a wool hat or a hobnail, while other peoples had enjoyed all the training and skill to be acquired in many preceding ages. We started as the merest tyros in manufactures, while all the master-workmen were domiciled in foreign lands. British artificers were forbidden to go abroad, and if they went, were outlawed. It is true that we have made a most commendable progress; and were foreign skill and competition gauged by its standard of one hundred years ago we should, perhaps, ask no favors; but during the past century, while we have advanced, foreign nations have not stood still, and in the productions which require extended labor and what might be almost termed hereditary aptitude it must be confessed that we have no workmen of equal skill who can be employed on the low terms accepted abroad. The difference of wages makes the difference, where there is any difference, in the price of merchandise here and elsewhere. That a wide difference does exist in wages no candid man will deny. At the very least this difference is 25 per cent. all over the American continent, and often 33⅓ per cent. or over in all foreign lands. Free trade would compel Americans to do something like 50 per cent. more work or to accept of 50 per cent. less wages. There can be no other result. To this complexion free trade must come at last, and a tariff for revenue only is a twin-brother of free trade.

The grandeur of our growth in agricultural and other industrial productions, in wealth and commerce, in learned and charitable institutions, compared with the foremost nations of the world, greatly and sufficiently vindicates the established American policy of raising a national revenue by a tariff which throws a large share of its burdens upon foreigners and gives sufficient incidental protection to our people engaged in multiplying and greatly augmenting our home productions and the general comforts of life.

The condition of laboring men and women here compared with the most favored conditions elsewhere shows the universal superiority of the thrift, intelligence, and sturdy independence of American homes and thoroughly refutes all charges against the policy of protection. Nowhere can the laboring man buy a shirt or a decent coat with less hours of labor than in the United States. Nowhere can tea and coffee be had at a less price; and nowhere can breadstuffs, butcher's meat, and all the common necessaries of the household be had so cheaply; and nowhere is the family of the laboring man so much respected or better housed.

Any change made in the tariff by which larger importations of foreign merchandise shall be made would supersede and take the place of the same amount of American merchandise, and the labor here employed in its production would remain idle or be forced into other avocations or have its wages put upon a level with the lowest grade of mankind. Ninety per cent. of all home consumption, it is fairly estimated, must be credited to those who labor with their hands. If productions are diminished they are to be the chief sufferers. If those now at work in mines, mills, and factories are driven into the field of farmers the increase of agricultural crops will diminish prices, and in the aggregate they will be of no more value than the present aggregate. The inexorable law of supply and demand will forever regulate prices.

If I have treated the positions of the Democratic party on the subject of the tariff with some levity, it is because some part of the discussion has been provocative of nothing else. But I by no means underrate the gravity of the questions involved, and I profoundly regret that the vast business interests of the country, at a moment of almost world-wide depression, should be subjected and subordinated to the supposed exigencies of a partisan and political campaign.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I will not delay the bankruptcy bill by making a speech. I assure the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] that I shall not occupy over five minutes. It would perhaps do just as well when the bankruptcy bill is up for me to show that the present high protective tariff is driving the country into bankruptcy.

I have listened carefully to the speech of the Senator from Vermont, in which he endeavored to annihilate me and disprove all I said the other day. He may have done so. He told a good many stale jokes, rung in Sancho Panza and several old almanac stories, as well as some poetry. Of course he made some very unfavorable comparisons between myself and some of the statesmen who represented my State in former days. I do not know what that has to do particularly with this argument. I charged and proved when I spoke the other day that all through the war, when that gentleman had charge of important tariff legislation, he declared that those laws were only to be temporary, that tariff taxes were to be reduced as soon as the internal-revenue taxes then imposed were removed. I showed that they had been all removed fifteen years ago. I proved that in 1870 he said the protectionists had no right to claim lawful prize of protection when the internal-revenue taxes were then all removed. I proved that the leading statesmen of his own party all insisted that the tariff reduction he had promised ought to be made. I showed that the Tariff Commission was made up of men who were not only working in the interest of the manufacturers, but that they allowed the manufacturers themselves to make up their own schedules, and that no relief had been given to the country. More than all that, I proved that he, at the head of a conference committee, disregarded the will of the Senate and of the House, and imposed taxes on all the people much higher than either House desired; that he did this against the known will of both Houses, and piled up taxes on the necessaries of life, in plain violation of his known duty.

When I charged these facts upon the floor of the Senate in March, 1883, he went into the cloak-room to avoid answering, and when he saw fit to engage in newspaper interviewing with his colleague [Mr. SHERMAN], in which each abused the other and each confessed that they had done all that I charged, although he had seen fit to abuse me in that interview (which I do not care to read, for I do not care to put uncalled-for abuse on myself in the RECORD), I chose to defend my action here in my place and in his presence and again denounced the action of the conferees and proved all I said. To-day he is as silent as the grave as to any of those facts and charges.

I supposed he would at least defend the action of the conference committee; that he would show why he imposed a duty on common earthenware up to 60 per cent. ad valorem when neither the Senate nor the House had thought of imposing such a tax, a tax far above the high war tariff. I expected him to tell why he increased the tariff upon steel-rails much higher than the two Houses had agreed should be imposed; why he inserted new clauses that neither House had ever seen into both the cotton and the woolen schedules, thereby largely increasing the taxes upon this people. He said not a word about these things, but he made comparisons between Kentucky and Ohio, comparisons between myself, humble as I am, and some of the great leaders who have had the honor to represent Kentucky in days gone by. That is to go to the country as an answer to legitimate arguments. I shall not condescend to answer them.

He says Kentucky is not as great as Ohio in her products. Kentucky is prosperous; Kentucky is happy; her people are contented, and he need not think that he can by any speech even make them discontented with her present representatives. If he wants to tell the people of Kentucky that they ought to leave me at home he might just as well save himself the trouble; they will attend to their own business in that regard and all others.

He might have taken Vermont and Kentucky for the sake of comparative growth. I might take them and compare them. Kentucky in 1840 had 779,828 people, Vermont 291,948; in 1850 Kentucky had 982,405; Vermont had 314,120. In 1860 Kentucky had 1,155,684 people, and Vermont had 315,098. In 1870 Kentucky had 1,321,011; Vermont had 330,551. In 1880 Kentucky had 1,648,708 and Vermont had 332,286—only 2,000 more people in 1880 than she had in 1870. He might have illustrated other things by picking out Vermont perhaps just as well as to have worked up contrasts as to growth between Ohio and Kentucky.

I made a good many notes in regard to the Senator's speech while he was making it, but in my judgment it is not worth answering, and therefore I have nothing to say now.

SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. HOAR. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). The unfinished business of yesterday is now in order, being the bill (S. 1372) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate had proceeded in its consideration to section 72. Section 72 will be read.

Mr. GARLAND. In looking over section 70 of the bill since we adjourned yesterday I am not exactly satisfied with the condition in which it leaves the matter of review in district courts exercising circuit court powers. I offer an amendment, to come in after the word "dollars," in line 12 of that section, which I think will fully cover the point that was suggested by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], about which I have had some reflection since.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 70, line 12, after the word "dollars," it is proposed to insert:

And if in a district court exercising circuit court powers, all rulings, when the sum in dispute exceeds $500, may be reviewed in the same manner by the circuit justice or the circuit judge of the circuit in which such district may be.

Mr. GARLAND. That covers the point suggested by the Senator from Mississippi, and which I answered yesterday; but upon reflection I am not satisfied with the answer I gave then, and on comparing the general laws with the pending measure I propose the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on inserting the words proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. At the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana, section 59 was passed over to allow the consideration of the last clause in relation to a judgment-roll. I have given very careful reflection to that matter since the suggestion was made. Section 79 preserves the rights of the creditors sufficiently, and I think it will be better to have that whole matter stricken out of section 59, because when it was inserted the fact that in some of the Western States a judgment becomes a lien did not occur to me as so serious a matter as it seems now on reflection. This applies to all sorts of little debts; and of course a creditor in Maine may have his debt proved against a debtor in Oregon or California, and I think it is quite objectionable to have that merged in a judgment in the court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy, especially if the right and duty to issue execution for that debt should follow in that court. I therefore move to strike out from line 45 to line 50, inclusive, in the fifty-ninth section.

The words proposed to be stricken out were read, as follows:

In case of the refusal of the court to grant a discharge to any bankrupt, the proof of debt filed in such proceeding shall be considered, for all intents and purposes, as a judgment-roll, and like proceedings may be had for the collection of such debt, less the amount paid thereon for dividends, as in the case of an ordinary judgment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and section 72 was read.

Mr. GEORGE. I move to strike out in lines 16 and 17 the words:

Performed within six months before the bankruptcy.

I do not see the justice of excluding this preference to servants and laborers whose work was done prior to the six months next preceding the bankruptcy. I think it is fair and just to them that their debts should be considered as preference debts to the amount of $100 whenever and wherever contracted. I hope the Senate will strike out that limitation of time.

I wish to state in addition that it very frequently happens that servants and laborers have claims against their employers for wages for work which was done by them more than six months prior to the bankruptcy. I think it is but fair to strike out this limit, and allow the $100 to be paid to them for work and labor, it makes no difference at what time, provided it is a valid debt against the bankrupt.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me this is a very liberal provision. It is enlarged in liberality compared with former laws. I hope the Senate will not strike out the limitation of time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

Mr. HARRISON. I am inclined to think that the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi is a reasonable one. If the preference is allowed to the amount of $100, I can not see that it makes any difference whether that $100 accrued to the laborer within six months or twelve months. He is allowed to have a preference up to $100, and I think the Senator from Massachusetts should consent to strike out the six months.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I shall be glad to see this amendment prevail provided the provision as to priority of debts is changed from the way it stands as reported in the bill. I shall be glad to see a preference given to wages over some of the other debts, as debts due the United States, or to the State for taxes, &c. Because it very frequently happens that the services of the employé of the bankrupt have contributed to the estate, and they are a class of men, laborers and clerks and those persons, who contribute to swell the estate. The assets of the bankrupt are very generally largely owing to the labors of these men. Under the laws of distribution of the States, when a party dies, debts due servants are among the first to be paid, and I do not see why they should be postponed to debts due the United States or to the States, because it very frequently happens, as I before remarked, that the services of these laborers or servants have contributed to the estate. They ought to be paid before some of these other claims that have priority by the bill. I shall be glad to see a different arrangement from that contained in the bill. I am perfectly willing to make these debts a preference after costs and expenses.

Mr. HOAR. I think in the fourth clause of the section the first word "debts" should be stricken out before "taxes;" so as to read:

Fourth. Taxes and assessments made under the laws of the State where the proceedings are pending, and debts due such State, when by the laws thereof such debts have priority against insolvent debtors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi to strike out the words "performed within six months before the bankruptcy," in the fifth subdivision.

Mr. HOAR. I thought that had been agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not been disposed of.

Mr. HOAR. I will not make any question about that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Now I move, in line 11, in the fourth subdivision of section 72, to strike out the word "debts" before "taxes."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. That being done, I move to strike out the word "debts," at the beginning of the third subdivision; so as to read:

Third. Taxes and assessments due to the United States which have been proved.

Leaving out "debts" there as in the other case.

Mr. HOAR. It is the universal policy, I believe, of every State in this country and of every civilized government, and has been the uniform policy of this Government from its foundation, to give preference as against insolvent estates, whether of deceased persons or living persons who are insolvent, to its own debts and taxes, which are presumed to have been matters incurred for the carrying on of the Government itself, which is the paramount necessity of all necessities. Now, it seems to me if that policy is to be changed it ought to be changed by some special enactment applicable to all cases alike. Why the United States should have its preference against the insolvent estate of every deceased person in the country and why it should reserve the advantage of having no statute of limitations run against it and all the other advantages, and then a Senator come in and make this little attack on the policy in a bankrupt law, I do not understand. I think that should be left to general legislation. I hope the provision will not be changed. If you remove the advantage of the United States you have also to remove the advantage from the States.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Senator from Mississippi in making the motion to strike out the word "debts" had it in mind that it was necessary in order to put the State governments on the same plane with the United States Government now that the word "debts" has been stricken out in the fourth clause.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. But he is mistaken in that, because if he will read the fourth clause through he will find that debts due the States are preserved there. So the two clauses are exactly harmonious as they are now; that is, debts, taxes, and assessments due the State are preserved; so that the striking out of the word "debts" in the fourth subdivision did not make the disparity between the General Government and the States that the Senator seemed to think.

But I want to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the words in the thirteenth line, which give these debts due the State priority "when by the laws thereof such debts have priority against insolvent debtors." It may be that some of our States have no insolvent laws at all, and have no provision on this subject. The operation of this language would be that if there was a State that had no provision in her statutes by which a debt due to the State should have priority she could not claim it under this law. The suggestion I wish to make is whether it would not be best to put this precisely in the language of the third subdivision:

Debts, taxes, and assessments due to the State.

I only make the suggestion.

Mr. HOAR. The phrase "due to the State" would not cover it.

Mr. HARRISON. That is true.

Mr. HOAR. I should have no objection to amending it so far as to say, "to such State which have been proved," which we say in the clause in regard to the United States.

Mr. HARRISON. I think that would do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

Mr. COKE. The Senator from Mississippi has been called away for a moment to the Supreme Court room.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOAR. I move, in the fourth subdivision of this section, to strike out the words "when by the laws thereof such debts have priority against insolvent debtors" and insert "which have been proved," after the word "State."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts and also to the Senate one difficulty that occurs to my mind—perhaps the Senator will be able to explain it—in this connection with the fifth paragraph or subdivision of this section.

Section 43 of the bill reserves to the bankrupt all the exemptions to which he may be entitled under the State law existing prior to the bankruptcy. The bill also protects liens in the nature of judgments or mortgages which may have been perfected before the act of bankruptcy. But the fifth subdivision of this section seems to me to interfere with another class of liens provided for by the laws of most of the States, if not all. I refer to mechanics' liens. These liens are to the entire amount of wages due and the cost of materials furnished. It seems to me if we are to preserve, as the forty-third section does, the exemption of the States to the bankrupt and we are to preserve the liens of judgment and mortgages, we should also preserve the liens that accrue under the mechanics' lien laws of the several States. Now, unless there is something in the bill which makes provision for that further than this preference as to $100 of wages due in the fifth paragraph of the section, then of course there would be no preference to mechanics or laborers beyond the $100 here provided for.

Mr. HOAR. This bill preserves all liens. I think I can find it.

Mr. WILSON. I have not had my attention called to that nor have I been able to get my eye upon it.

Mr. GARLAND. Section 42.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Iowa to make a motion relative to any change?

Mr. WILSON. I am simply making inquiry now of the Senator having charge of the bill. This is a pretty important consideration, and I would suggest that the paragraph be passed over informally until we can examine it further and see whether the matter is provided for.

Mr. HOAR. The paragraph the Senator calls attention to does not seem to me to touch his question. This is a matter of the preferences against the estate, not of the claims of priority, a totally distinct matter. It is a dividend out of the estate. This is an additional right to the workman, clerk, or servant. If he has a mortgage or if he has a statute mechanics' or laborers' lien, this is in addition to that. Of course I do not mean that he would get it paid twice, but he would have a double election of the two remedies. The statute only conveys to the trustee such property as the debtor has and such property as the debtor has subject to whatever legal liens exist at the time of the first publication of the notice.

Mr. WILSON. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi suggested this question to my mind, and I have not been able as yet to find in the bill a provision to cover it.

Mr. HOAR. If there is any question about it the question would be removed by adding some provision at the end of the bill. This particular section is not the place for it, because this is the section in regard to claims against the fund, not in regard to what property shall pass. The true way would be to add the same provision which was in Judge Story's bankrupt law, that all existing liens except as aforesaid shall be preserved. That is the effect of the bill now.

Mr. WILSON. This section provides for the priority of debts.

Mr. HOAR. The priority of claims on the fund. It has no relation at all to the right of a mortgage or a joint owner or of a creditor having a lien. That would be properly dealt with either by a general provision at the end of the bill or in the section which provides for what property shall pass to the assignee or trustee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would suggest to the Senator from Iowa that it might be well to proceed with other sections, delaying the consideration of section 72 for the present.

Mr. WILSON. My suggestion was that that be passed over informally until further examination can be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be done. The next section will be read.

Section 73 was read.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think it necessary to pass over section 72, and I will reply now to the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa. Let me repeat that the section which we are dealing with simply provides after the assignee has converted this estate into cash—into a fund to be distributed—in what order the various creditors shall have the fund paid out to them. The suggestion of the Senator from Iowa is that he wishes to be satisfied whether the bill properly preserves from passing to the assignee at all, from his getting hold of it, the property, without first securing the rights of creditors who have liens upon it either by statute or mortgage. This section which we are dealing with does not affect that question at all. That is dealt with in section 42; and if any clearer expression is required it should be put in there to accomplish the Senator's purpose. Section 42 says:

That when a trustee has been duly appointed and qualified there shall vest in him, for the purposes of this act, all the property and estate of every kind, except as hereafter provided, which the bankrupt had.

If the bankrupt's property is the right to redeem a mortgage or an estate subject to a lien under the laws of his State, that is what vests in the trustee, and that is all. Then it goes on:

And the estate in his hands shall not be subject to any liens, charges, or incumbrances which, for want of record or otherwise, would not then have been valid as against the creditors of the bankrupt.

Implying that the liens which would have been valid against his creditors by the existing law of the State shall be valid against the trustee. But if so clear and accurate a lawyer as the Senator from Iowa thinks that that section is not clear, I will consent to any phrase which he shall put in, but there is the place to put it, and not here.

Mr. WILSON. I have no doubt of that. As I have already remarked, my attention was called to the subject from the provision made in the fifth subdivision of section 72, and it seems to me that the provision in section 42 is not broad enough to reach it.

Mr. HOAR. I think it is, but I will agree to put into section 42 these words, or something equivalent: "subject to every existing legal lien except as hereinafter provided."

Mr. WILSON. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Section 74 will be read.

The Secretary read sections 74 to 78 inclusive.

Mr. GEORGE. At the end of section 78 I move to add:

And in the meaning of this act no security given or suffered, and no payment made, shall be deemed unlawful unless it be a real preference; that is, unless it be for a greater part of the debt so paid or secured than the debtor was able at the time of such payment or securing to pay or give security on all his other debts, it being the intent and meaning hereof that an insolvent debtor may rightfully pay any credit or his pro rata or equal share of his assets or give like security out of the same.

Mr. HOAR. I hope that will not be adopted. It would very clearly overthrow the whole purpose of the act.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not see how that would overthrow the whole purpose of the act, unless it is the purpose of this act that when a man becomes insolvent he can not honestly and fairly do what this act is intended to make him do. I understand the whole object of this act is to require an insolvent's assets to be paid out equally among all his creditors with certain exceptions allowed in the act. If that is not the purpose and object of this act it is of no use to have any bankrupt act at all. The object of the amendment is to allow an insolvent to do voluntarily of his own motion that which this act is intended to make him do.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator intend that a man who is able to pay 70 per cent. only of his debts may pay that 70 per cent. to a few of his favored creditors, putting them beyond risk, and then go on at the risk of his business, leaving the others to get their pay or not as his future business turns out? That is the effect of the amendment as I understand it.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, in answer to the question of the Senator from Massachusetts I will say that I mean to allow an insolvent still to be a man. I do not propose, if I can help it, to have a law enacted which prevents a citizen doing honestly, fairly, that which this act is passed to make him do. It seems to me to be an anomaly in jurisprudence to pass an act to secure a result from a party before the court when that very result is prohibited to be done by the agency of the party himself. I understand that the object of a court of justice is this and no more—to compel a party brought before it to do that which he will not do willingly of himself. The object is to secure a remedy against him for his own default for his refusal to do that which the law requires him to do.

In further answer to the question propounded by the Senator from Massachusetts I have this to say: It is impossible for a man, solvent or insolvent, to make a payment to anybody without giving him a preference, unless he can get all his creditors together at one time and at one place, and hand to each of them his share of the money. If he pays one to-day, that is a preference over the man he pays to-morrow; or if he pays one at 12 o'clock it is a preference over the man whom he pays at 1 o'clock on the same day.

I think this is one of the reasons why bankrupt laws, as was so fully proven to the Senate by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] and by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] at the last session, have all the time proved ineffective and destructive. What does a bankrupt law aim at? It wants the man in debt to pay out to each creditor his fair share of his assets. You pass a law for that purpose; you create an expensive machinery for that purpose; thirty-odd officers are salaried out of the United States Treasury for that purpose; large costs are incurred for that purpose; and yet in the very law intended to secure that thing you prohibit the man from doing it himself without cost to anybody.

Of course the debtor takes the risk in making a payment that he does not pay too much; he takes the risk of violating the provisions of this proposed act in reference to unlawful preferences. If he gives more to one than he is able to give to another, and if he violates that rule by giving more to one than he does to another, he incurs the penalties imposed by this measure. But suppose he does not do it; suppose he is honest; suppose he undertakes to carry out the intent and purpose of this act; he is insolvent; is there any inexorable law or policy that requires the debtor to go into the bankruptcy court and let the court do for him what the law will not allow him to do for himself and for his creditors? I can not see it, sir.

Recurring again to the proof brought here mountain-high by the Senator from Arkansas who sits to my left [Mr. GARLAND] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] at the last session, that all bankruptcy laws both in this country and in England to the present time have been miserable failures, have resulted in simply taking the assets of the unfortunate and squandering them in administration; looking at that proof, is there anything resulting from the past history of bankruptcy laws either in England or in this country which should make us hasten to take from a citizen his property when he has done nothing wrong with it, when he does not propose to do anything wrong with it, when he actually proposes to do exactly what the bankrupt law requires him to do, and that it shall take from him the mastery and ownership and control of his property, giving it to whom? Giving it in the first place to a court, a court with all of its machinery, the judge learned in the law as he may be, but with his agents and with all this expensive machinery. Is not a court the last thing in the world to intrust with the transaction of such business? It is very competent to decide a question of law or a question of right between A and B, and to render a judgment against a party who is in default in the performance of a legal duty. But this bill goes beyond that. This proposed law makes the court a business concern. It undertakes to transfer to it and to its control and management large amounts of property. I say there is no machinery conceivable which is honest so likely to produce less good results than the management of an estate by a court.

There have been two theories in bankruptcy laws heretofore. One was what was called the official or court management. That proved a failure. The other was a management by the creditors. That proved a failure. Everything has proved a failure to the present time. Nothing has been satisfactory. The bankruptcy court has been but a mill through which were ground out large fees and perquisites and emoluments to those who managed it, robbing the debtor and paying nothing or next to nothing to the creditors.

Now, why can we not change that? Why can we not allow something to the citizen, to the debtor who must manage his own business in the ordinary time? You can not transact the business of this country through courts, through commissioners, through supervisors. It is the energy, it is the pluck, it is the good sense of the various citizens of this country who are pursuing their own callings which make this country great and prosperous.

The bill as now framed proposes to step in as to all those who in the pursuits and business of life have fallen a little behind, because under this bill the debtor is insolvent if he can pay only 98 cents on the dollar; he is insolvent if he can not meet all his debts. Under the bill he not only must be able to meet all of his debts in a reasonable time, but he must be able to meet them on the very day, or within thirty days after the time for payment. That is the definition given by the Supreme Court in the case referred to by the Senator from Arkansas yesterday, as the meaning of insolvency, and you have not changed the meaning of that by putting the word "actually" before insolvent. I suppose if a man is insolvent he is actually insolvent. It only means that he is really insolvent.

There is no definition here, as was contained in the bill reported from the Judiciary Committee last winter by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] defining what is insolvency. It happens under this bill that when a man has not paid his commercial paper within thirty days, although he may be amply able to pay it, he can not do that thing he ought to do, he can not pay anybody anything, he can not make an honest division of his assets, but he must go into the bankruptcy court and turn over his property there, and let it be squandered as it has always been both in England and in this country under any bankruptcy system which has ever been devised.

Instead of enacting laws to compel men to go into bankruptcy when they want to do right, and have done nothing that is wrong, I should like to see laws passed to enable them to do right, to do that which the bankruptcy law is intended to compel them to do without forcing them unnecessarily into court. I can not understand the guardianship assumed by the bill over the unfortunate debtor who has done no wrong, who proposes to do no wrong, who proposes to do exactly what the bill requires to be done—not requires him to do, but requires to be done by the action of a court.

Mr. BAYARD. Would it interrupt my friend for me to ask him a question?

Mr. GEORGE. Not at all.

Mr. BAYARD. He has omitted the very thing to which the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] drew the attention of my colleague [Mr. SAULSBURY] yesterday, that before any of this coercion can be applied to a debtor he must be at the time actually insolvent.

Mr. GEORGE. What is "actually insolvent?" It just means that he can not pay his debts at that time.

Mr. BAYARD. Oh, no. I will not give the definition of actual insolvency, but I suppose——

Mr. GEORGE. Can you draw a distinction between a man who is insolvent and one who is actually insolvent?

Mr. BAYARD. I suppose the definition of insolvency can be found in half a dozen decisions.

Mr. GEORGE. It is found in the decision of the Supreme Court in Toof vs. Martin, cited by the Senator from Arkansas on yesterday.

Mr. BAYARD. But the definition of actual insolvency is not that a man at a given moment can not meet any pecuniary obligation. There may be outstanding credits due him which will soon enable him to do so. There is scarcely a moment in any man's life at which he may not be so caught that there could not be an immediate cash payment of his debts. That is not a case of actual insolvency.

Mr. GEORGE. The bill gives him thirty days in which to pay, I will state to the Senator from Delaware. I intend to offer an amendment and see how that will be voted on, taken from the bill reported by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], in which insolvency is defined, and we will see whether in the sense of the Senate that will be the rule, or the rule laid down as quoted by the Senator from Arkansas yesterday by the Supreme Court of the United States in Toof vs. Martin.

But, sir, it makes no difference to the argument I am making whether the party be insolvent technically by want of ability to meet his debts on the day named or within thirty days thereafter, or whether there be an actual deficiency of assets to meet his liabilities; I still stand on the ground that here you find a man who has committed no fault, who by misfortune, by fire, by shipwreck, by unfortunate speculation, by the failure of men who are indebted to him, has become unable to meet his debts, and then when he proposes to do exactly what this bankruptcy law is to be passed to secure to be done, you say to him, "You have committed an act of bankruptcy," or, in other words, that which is honest and right if done by the bankrupt court with the bankrupt's property is dishonest and unlawful if done by the bankrupt himself.

Is not that a very singular result of legislation? You hound the man by tying his hands into the commission of an act of bankruptcy, and take from him the control of his assets when he means to do, when he is actually doing, with those assets exactly what the bill says ought to be done with them.

Mr. President, I think the amendment ought to be adopted. It may destroy the theory upon which the bill is founded; I do not know about that. It will not destroy the most essential and proper theory upon which it is founded, and that is the securing of an honest, equal, and fair distribution of the assets of an insolvent debtor among his creditors. It will not destroy that. It will promote that, and will secure a larger dividend than will remain after it has been wasted and squandered either by accident or design in its administration through a bankruptcy court.

There is another amendment akin to this to which I had as well call attention right now, which I suppose would be counter to the theory of a bankruptcy law as understood by the Senator from Massachusetts. To what theory of that law is it counter? It is not counter to the theory of having an honest and fair division of the assets of the debtor among his creditors, but only counter to the theory which has proved to be the bane of every bankruptcy law which has ever been passed, that the court and its officials, its registers, its clerks, its trustees, its commissioners, and its supervisors are better managers of the estate of an individual than the party is himself, and that nothing can be done by a man who is either technically or really insolvent in the way of carrying out the very end and aim sought, a bankrupt law itself. If the Senate and the country want a bill passed which will deprive a citizen of his natural and legal rights over his property when he does not propose to do anything wrong about it—if that is the theory of the bill, I think the sooner we abandon it the better, if we can not get up a theory that is more consistent with the rights not only of the debtor himself but of his creditors.

Mr. HOAR. The bill only prohibits a payment by a debtor with intent to prefer. He must, in order to have the payment illegal or an act of bankruptcy, mean to prefer one creditor over another. That is the bill now. The Senator comes in and moves to have inserted in it a declaration that if he pays 75 or any other per cent. of his debts to one creditor and is able to pay others as much, whether he is willing or not, that shall not be an act of bankruptcy, and shall not be prohibited. That would leave the debtor who can not pay 100 per cent. on the dollar at liberty to cheat all his creditors but one and to prefer that one without having the act prohibited or an act of bankruptcy.

Everything that the Senator in his argument says ought to be accomplished is accomplished now. The effect of his amendment is simply to give a debtor a chance to cheat, as I understand it.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator is mistaken about the bill. The preference of an insolvent trader given to an individual is not the only ground upon which he can be put into bankruptcy.

Mr. HOAR. The payment we are talking about is only with intent to prefer. That is the only practical thing here.

Mr. GEORGE. I understand; but if he pays a creditor and does not pay anybody else, then he is still liable to the others, to be proceeded against under your thirty days' clause, and he can be put into bankruptcy. What I am aiming at is that the payment of a particular sum which he would be able to pay to everybody else shall not of itself constitute an act of bankruptcy.

Mr. HOAR. It does not now under the bill, unless it is done with the intent to prefer. That is the answer to that.

Mr. GEORGE. But the bankruptcy courts would hold, because I come to that now, and they would be still authorized to hold, that any payment which does prefer was done with the intent to prefer. The Senator is very familiar with the rule of law which says that a man is supposed to intend to do what he does do, and if it does operate, as everybody sees it will, in giving this man a preference, that is not a preference in amount but a preference in time, then the intent is conclusively presumed.

But to go back to section 33, to another amendment which illustrates itself, there is a provision in this bill which prohibits an insolvent debtor from making an assignment of his property with or without preference. A man finds himself insolvent; he finds himself unable to pay his debts, and he proposes to do exactly what the bill requires a court to do for him. He makes an assignment, by which every single creditor he has is put upon an exactly equal footing. That ought to satisfy everybody; but no, that of itself is made an act of bankruptcy, and the assignment itself is declared to be void.

It seems that when a man becomes insolvent under this bill nothing can be done unless it be done in and through and by the agency of the bankrupt court. Mr. President, I have said that was an off-hand anomaly, as compared with other proceedings in this country—not anomalous in a bankrupt law, for it is in nearly all of them, I believe, and it has been the bane and curse by which all of them have proved failures—stopping and making a court and its incompetent officials the managers of private interests and depriving the owner of the right and power of control.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] to section 78.

Mr. INGALLS. That amendment is "fearfully and wonderfully made." I hardly think the Senator from Mississippi would desire, even if his ideas were to prevail, to have that amendment incorporated as a part of the statute. There is, in the first place, a declaration of the intention of the act, and that is followed by an explanation of the meaning of the first part of the amendment, and the whole closes with a further declaration as to what the true intent of the meaning of both the preceding paragraphs is.

I am not sure that I am not partially in sympathy with the views expressed by the Senator from Mississippi, but I should be unable, under any view of the case, to give my assent to an amendment that was so peculiarly and inartificially drawn as that which he has submitted. I think the best thing that can be done with it would be to let it lie on the table.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the amendment does unusually declare the true intent and meaning of the act, but that is sometimes done, and it is very necessary to take all these precautions against the disposition, as I know it will exist, on the part of some persons engaged in the administration of this law to rule everything the other way. As the Senator from Kansas thinks well of the idea embraced in the amendment, I shall be glad to withdraw it and accept one drawn by him artificially and in proper form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to strike out of section 78 the last paragraph, between lines 38 and 43. Let the part proposed to be stricken out be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

> If a debtor shall, directly or indirectly, pay money or transfer property to an attorney-at-law for the services to be rendered him in bankruptcy beyond a reasonable retainer, and thereafter becomes bankrupt, such payment shall be a preference, and the trustee may recover the amount by summary process.

Mr. INGALLS. This paragraph appears to me to be a blow aimed directly at the legal profession, and I think it would in any event be inoperative. I should be unwilling to impose any limitation on the amount of fees that a merchant might see fit to pay an attorney for the advice and assistance he might give him in the transaction of his business. The words "reasonable retainer" are so indefinite and vague and nebulous that it would be impossible to obtain anything like a satisfactory declaration ultimately of what they meant. A "reasonable retainer" in one section of the country might mean one thing and in another another. Of course, if there is any transfer of property to an attorney or to anybody else in advance of the initiation of the proceedings that amounts in the estimation of the officer holding the position of judge to a preference, it will be set aside. I trust the Senator from Massachusetts will see the impropriety of attempting to limit the amount of attorney's fees that a merchant might pay for counsel and assistance, especially if he were in desperate or dangerous circumstances.

Mr. HOAR. I rose a little later than the Senator from Kansas with a view of making the same motion which he has made. I think all that the clause is intended to accomplish is accomplished without it; that is, if there were a colorable or pretended conveyance of property to an attorney under pretense of paying him for services but in reality to transfer the property to him, the law would break that up, and the juries to whom that question would be submitted would apply the law with entire strictness.

Mr. HARRISON. I want to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether this was not the object of this provision, and whether there was not perhaps a reason why it should be retained. This is not to pay for services rendered; it is to pay for services to be rendered in connection with the bankruptcy proceedings. That is, a person contemplating bankruptcy, voluntary or involuntary, and expecting litigation with creditors, some attacks upon his transfers or opposition to his discharge, undertakes in advance of the adjudication in bankruptcy to make an arrangement with his counsel, and to transfer property to him which shall pay him for all the services to be rendered in resisting the creditors or in proceedings to be instituted by the creditors. It seems to me there was abuse under the operation of the old law, and I think I have known some cases where there was an abuse which this provision would correct. It is not a preference, because the debt does not exist to the attorney. It is a contract made then with a stipulation for fees to be paid for services to be rendered, and the general provisions of the bill with reference to preferences would not affect such a contract at all.

Mr. HOAR. I think that such contracts as the Senator describes ought to be permitted; that is, the bankrupt who is to be stripped of everything except the exemption which is made ought to have the right to engage counsel to look after his legal rights in the transaction and to pay them, and he ought to have the right to pay them more than a retainer. He ought to have a right to pay for the service; otherwise he can not get the service; he is left of all mankind without counsel. The evil which has existed must certainly be guarded against by a proper administration of the law. If the bankrupt has made to a lawyer more than a fair price for such services as are fairly to be expected the trustee may sue the counsel, as he would under this clause, without this clause, and the jury would give him back the whole or the excess above what is a reasonable and just equivalent for what the bankrupt ought to have a right to secure. I therefore hope the clause will be stricken out.

Mr. INGALLS. It will be observed further that this clause also provides that if the payment is beyond a reasonable retainer in the judgment of the commission, or supervisor, or judge, this payment is a preference, and the trustee may recover—what? Not the excess above a reasonable retainer, but he may recover the entire amount; that is, the transaction may be an entirely just one, it may be a reasonable one, the contract may be such as ought to be sustained; and yet if in the judgment of the commissioner, or supervisor, or judge, it is more than he thinks the attorney ought to have been paid, larger than would have been a fair compensation for professional services, it is to be entirely set aside and the whole amount, leaving nothing whatever for payment for the attorney's fees for services that have been rendered, is to be recovered back by a quasi-criminal proceeding. I do not think that paragraph contains any provision which ought to be retained.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] to strike out the last clause of section 78.

The amendment was agreed to.

Sections 79 to 83, inclusive, were read.

Mr. HOAR. I was not aware that the Senate had got past the second sentence of section 82, and I should like unanimous consent to make there a grammatical change simply.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). If there be no objection, the Senator may propose his amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Section 82 limits the false and fraudulent statements which are to affect the discharge to such statements made in writing and signed by the bankrupt, to prevent the pressure upon him by unfounded charges of fraud sworn to by witnesses. I move, after the word "made," in line 15, to insert the words "in writing;" and then after the word "statement," in the same line, to insert "subscribed by him;" and then to strike out "which statement shall be made in writing and subscribed by said bankrupt," in the sixteenth and seventeenth lines; so as to read:

> Or if he has within one year before his bankruptcy knowingly made in writing any false and fraudulent statement, subscribed by him, to any person or persons, and made for the purpose of being communicated to the trade, &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The amendment was agreed to.

Sections 84 to 88, inclusive, were read.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to offer an amendment to come in at the end of section 85. I ask unanimous consent to offer the amendment now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent of the Senate to return to section 85 in order that he may offer an amendment thereto. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. GEORGE. My amendment is to add to section 85:

> And no debt shall be released by a discharge which may be due by any bank or individual for deposits or loans, either with or without interest, when such bank or individual has within twelve months before suspension or assignment for the benefit of creditors used its deposits or assets or any part thereof in buying or selling futures in any commodity whatever, or has loaned the same to any person or corporation so engaged, or having reasonable ground to believe that the borrower would so use it, or where such bank or individuals, being insolvent, shall have still continued to receive deposits or loans, or shall have misled in any way any depositor or lender as to his insolvency.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to examine that carefully, which I can not do just at this moment; therefore if the Senator will not regard it as discourteous I will withhold consent to going back and ask him to leave it until we get to the end of the bill. It is understood that that is the same amendment in substance as that of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. It relates to the same matter.

Mr. GEORGE. It embraces some other things.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will let it lie until we get to the end of the bill, very well. Let it be printed.

Mr. GARLAND. Let the amendment be printed, because it involves some principles that ought to be examined carefully.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. INGALLS. I move in section 87, line 3, to strike out the words "within two years after it passed."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to going back to section 87?

Mr. INGALLS. I thought it had just been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Section 88 has been read and section 89 was about to be read when the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] interposed.

Mr. HOAR. There will be no objection to going back.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to going back to section 87 for the purpose indicated by the Senator from Kansas? The Chair hears none.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to strike out, in line 3, section 87, the words "within two years after it passed;" so as to read:

> That the order granting a discharge may be reviewed and annulled by the judge in bankruptcy of the same court, upon the written application of any creditor or creditors whose debts, amounting to not less than $250, would be barred thereby.

This section provides for the review of a discharge "upon due notice and hearing and satisfactory evidence that such order was obtained by fraud or perjury, or that the bankrupt failed to surrender all his unexempt property, or influenced the action of any creditor in respect to said discharge or to a composition by any payment or promise contrary to law, and that such fraud, perjury, or illegal act was not known to said creditors in season to be availed of in opposition to such discharge, unless it was in fact put in issue and tried in good faith, upon the objection of other creditors, before the discharge."

I doubt very much the propriety of imposing the bar of a statute of limitations to any attempt to review based upon fraud and perjury. I believe that so long as the life of man endures, if it can be made to appear satisfactorily to a court that a discharge in bankruptcy was obtained by fraud and by perjury, it ought to be set aside, and that no law is justifiable which says that the intervention of a space of time so short as two years shall prevail as a successful interposition of fraud and perjury against the rights of creditors. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will see his way clear to permit this amendment to be made.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, of course no lapse of time, if it were a thousand years, ought to give effect to fraud and perjury; but at the same time it is necessary to consider the liability to mistake in the tribunal to be satisfied. It is not the case of a man contesting with a single creditor or a single enemy; it is a case where the interests of a thousand or sometimes of many thousands, often many hundreds, are concerned against one man. The debtor may have a vast number of creditors; his debts may grow out of the failure of some bank in which he is a stockholder, and the stockholder's liability may apply to him created by our statutes. I suppose there is one very well-known case in the country now being settled, where the number of creditors must be considerably more than a thousand. Now, to have the debtor exposed all his life to the danger of a false charge that he has committed perjury or fraud of any kind, that he has not fairly surrendered his property, or that he has influenced the action of a creditor by a payment on terms contrary to law, when the evidence on his side may have perished, it seems to me would be unjust. There ought to be some end. I think that two years is pretty short and I should be perfectly willing to make it six, which would extinguish ordinarily all the claims of the creditors if there had not been any bankruptcy, unless there had been a fraudulent concealment of the cause of action itself. I should be willing to agree to an extension of the time, but I should think having no time when the debtor was safe from having his whole indebtedness brought up again by a conspiracy among two creditors would be dangerous. Suppose a man fails for a large sum of money and acquires a new fortune at the end of eight or ten or fifteen years, and then men conspire against him and bring up the old bankruptcy proceeding?

Mr. HARRISON. I would suggest to the Senator, in the line of what he has suggested himself, whether it would not be well, leaving the limitation either two years or whatever term of years may be agreed upon, to fix no limitation as to cases of concealed fraud. Under our ordinary statutes of limitations if the cause of action is concealed by any act or work on the part of the debtor the statute does not run.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand that in cases of fraud or perjury the limitation begins to run after the discovery of the fraud.

Mr. HOAR. Not at all. That never occurs. In all the statutes of limitation with which I am familiar it is not the discovery of the fraud. The fraud may be a cause of action where there is a fraudulently concealed fact, and from that time it attaches. But I wish to suggest to the Senator from Kansas further that that is not one of these things which even are to go to the jury. A man is to have his rights barred on the decision of the court. It is true that sometimes judges are excellent triers of fact, and sometimes very learned judges are very poor triers of fact, as we all know. I suggest to my friend from Kansas that to make the term six years instead of two would be a practical and reasonable adjustment of the whole thing, but not strike out the limit altogether. I move to amend the clause by inserting "six" instead of "two," before the question is taken on striking out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to strike out "two" and insert "six."

Mr. GARLAND. The provision in the old law was two years, and I think it worked very well. I do not think it necessary to extend it to six years. When the question came up to which the Senator from Kansas referred, as to the application of the ordinary rule of the statute of limitations, the district court held:

> The application to set aside the discharge must be made within two years after it is granted; and it has been held that the ordinary rule applicable to statutes of limitation, which prevents the running of the statute in cases of fraud, while the fraud is undiscovered does not here apply, and that a different construction must be applied to the limitations under the bankrupt law. (Pickett vs. McGarrick, 3 Central L. J., 303; Norton vs. De la Villebeuve, 13 B. R., 304.) See, however, contra, Bailey vs. Weir, 12 id., 24, where the Supreme Court of the United States decided that the statute of limitations does not run against the assignee where the fraud alleged has been concealed until such fraud has been or could with ordinary diligence have been discovered, and the principles enunciated in that case we have no doubt are applicable to the limitation mentioned in the foregoing section.—Blumenstiel's Law and Practice in Bankruptcy, 555, 556.

So that, under the decision of the Supreme Court on the former act in respect to this two years' limitation, I think the point made by the Senator from Kansas is sufficiently secured by the section, and I do not see the necessity with that construction of extending the time beyond two years. I heard no complaint against the administration of the former act so far as this point is concerned.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the precise language of the limitation contained in the previous act?

Mr. GARLAND. Section 5120 of the Revised Statutes provided that—

> Any creditor of a bankrupt, whose debt was proved or provable against the estate in bankruptcy, who desires to contest the validity of the discharge on the ground that it was fraudulently obtained may, at any time within two years after the date thereof, apply to the court which granted it to annul the same. The application shall be in writing, &c.

Mr. INGALLS. And the court held that under that language the limitation was two years after the discovery of the fraud?

Mr. GARLAND. After the discovery of the particular fraud, or after the date when it might have been discovered by the exercise of reasonable diligence.

Mr. BAYARD. Would that construction be given to this act?

Mr. GARLAND. That is my impression.

Mr. INGALLS. If that is the construction placed upon the language, it would be better to adopt the language there used so as to leave no further room for construction.

Mr. GARLAND. I think that would be well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas propose to modify his amendment?

Mr. INGALLS. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to strike out "two" and insert "six."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. INGALLS. Now instead of my former amendment I move to strike out the words that I have named, "within two years after it passed," and to insert after the word "perjury," in line 7, the words "within two years after the discovery thereof."

Mr. HARRISON. Would not that leave the other causes named there without any limitation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 87, line 3, it is proposed to strike out "within two years after it passed," and in line 7, after the word "perjury," to insert "within two years after the discovery thereof."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment just reported.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas that he insert his amendment after the word "law," in the eleventh line, to obviate the objection made by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. INGALLS. These clauses deal with entirely different classes of cases on the part of the bankrupt. The first is obtaining a discharge by fraud or perjury; next comes the cause arising from the fact that the bankrupt failed to surrender all his unexempt property; and in the next clause influencing the action of the creditor by payment or promise contrary to law. The insertion of the words proposed might be after "law," by adding "within two years after the discovery of such fraud, perjury, or illegal act." Upon the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota I will modify the amendment by inserting, after the word "law," the words "within two years after the discovery of such fraud, perjury, or illegal act."

Mr. GARLAND. Let me ask the Senator from Kansas if it would not be as well then to follow up the language of the court, "or after the same could have been discovered by the exercise of ordinary diligence?"

Mr. INGALLS. If that is the language of the decision, I think it would be well to insert it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator so modify the amendment?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas as modified.

Mr. BAYARD. I should like to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 87, line 3, after the word "court," it is proposed to strike out the words "within two years after it passed;" and in line 11, after the word "law," to insert the words "within two years after the discovery of such fraud, perjury, or illegal act, or after the same could have been discovered by the exercise of ordinary diligence."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to make an amendment in section 88, to strike out the words, in lines 4 and 5, "some new and valuable consideration is given therefor, and."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to receiving the amendment to section 88, that section having been already read and passed? The Chair hears none. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana will be reported.

The SECRETARY. In section 88, line 4, after the word "unless," it is proposed to strike out the words "some new and valuable consideration is given therefor, and;" so as to make the section read:

> That every promise, covenant, undertaking, and security given by any bankrupt, whether before or after his discharge, to pay a provable debt, or any part thereof, notwithstanding his discharge, shall be void, unless the same is put in writing and signed by the party making said promise, or his duly authorized agent.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think a new consideration ought to be required. I think it is well to protect the discharged debtor against any pretense of a verbal promise to pay the debt; but if he deliberately consents in writing to renew the obligation from which he has been legally discharged in the bankruptcy court, it seems to me the moral obligation which certainly still rests upon him to pay that debt ought to be treated as a sufficient consideration in law for the new promise in writing. I think, as a question of morals, the consideration that originally moved him in the creation of the debt is sufficient to support the new promise. It is so in the case of statutes of limitation where they have fully run and barred the debt. My recollection is that it does not require a new consideration, and it is ample protection for the debtor if he is protected against the pretense that he has made an oral promise, and nothing can be alleged against him except his written promise to pay. If a man has borrowed a thousand dollars of a widow or some poor person unable to bear the loss, and is discharged from it in bankruptcy, the moral obligation to pay ought to be a sufficient consideration.

Mr. BAYARD. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Massachusetts what is the use of the section relating to new promises? There is nothing of course to prevent the voluntary payment by a man who, having become bankrupt and been discharged, subsequently becomes able to pay his debt. Of course he can do so voluntarily; there is no trouble about that; but what is the use of our undertaking to do more than prevent and entirely avoid a promise prior to his discharge? That he would pay a debt subsequently may be the consideration to prevent a creditor from contesting his discharge and be fraudulent; but as to all voluntary arrangements he may make thereafter, they are such as we have nothing to do with and which really a law of this kind can not undertake efficiently to consider. I can not help thinking that the whole of this clause relating to new promises is very immaterial.

Mr. HARRISON. I will say in response to the Senator from Delaware that I do not think it unreasonable that the discharged debtor should be protected against the pretense that he has made an oral promise. I think that may be necessary in order to give him the full benefit of his discharge. The oral promise may be alleged against him; it stands on the testimony of men simply; and he may find his old debts loaded upon him upon proof. It is a sufficient protection if the promise is required to be in writing, as in some contracts under the statute of frauds, but I am very clear that we ought not to require a new consideration.

Mr. GARLAND. The nature of the new promise is one that runs through all the statutes of bankruptcy about which I have any information, and I think for the very salutary reason suggested by the Senator from Indiana it is thrown back frequently on the party that he simply went through or was put through bankruptcy for the purpose of avoiding certain debts and selecting afterward some debts that he desires to pay, and he becomes entangled and embarrassed afterward by debt. But this is a new feature, the point that is made by the Senator from Indiana, "unless some new and valuable consideration is given therefor." For one I am perfectly willing to have that language go out. I do not think that is necessary; but I prefer to retain the remainder of the section.

Mr. HOAR. As I understand the law at present, where a statute operates as a mere limitation on the right to sue, not extinguishing the cause of action, but only prohibiting suing on it, like the ordinary statute of limitations, no new consideration is necessary; a mere waiver of the statute privilege is enough, and by a new promise, although there be no new considerations; but where the debt is totally extinguished and gone, as by bankruptcy, it has been a debated question, if I recollect aright, whether the old moral obligation, as it is termed, is sufficient to support the promise. I think in most States in this country it is held that it is not, and that there must be a new consideration as well as a new promise to oblige a debtor to pay a debt which has been extinguished by the statute of limitations. In other words, it is a new debt.

If this is stricken out the question will then be remanded to the different States to settle, and it will depend upon the lex loci contractus. If our discharge will have no operation in determining the validity of a new promise by the debtor, it will depend upon the exposition of the law by the courts of the debtor's State or the State where the contract was made. That seems to me to be very reasonable, though I have no objection to the words going out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PIKE. I wish to propose another amendment to section 88, which is in line 7, after the word "authorized," to strike out "agent," and after the word "his," in the same line, to insert "agent," and at the end of the line to add the words "in writing;" so as to read:

Or his agent duly authorized in writing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. If it is in order I will move to strike out all of section 88 after the word "void," in line 4. The bill professes to be a bill to forbid preferences, but this section manifestly authorizes a preference. It authorizes a party to assume a debt from which he has been discharged. Again, the object of the bill is to set on foot a debtor released from all his obligations, and yet the section expressly provides that the released debtor may reassume those obligations and encumber himself with them for the future.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of section 88 after the word "void," in line 4, as follows:

Unless the same is put in writing and signed by the party making said promise, or his agent duly authorized in writing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

The amendment was rejected.

The Secretary read from section 89 to section 92, inclusive.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask the Senator in charge of the bill if he does not think we might adjourn now. It is 5 o'clock.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope that no motion to adjourn will be made. I think it is necessary to have an executive session for a few moments.

Mr. BAYARD. Let us have an executive session and adjourn afterward.

Mr. HOAR. We are within twelve pages of the end of the bill. Then there are one or two amendments to be offered, one reserved by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] who is not now in his seat.

Mr. BAYARD. I merely made the suggestion as a question of the convenience of the Senate. It is now 5 o'clock.

Mr. HOAR. Allow me to say that the time to-day has been taken for nearly two hours by some excellent speeches on both sides of the tariff question from the Committee on Finance, of which the Senator from Delaware is an eminent member.

Mr. BAYARD. I was not the instigator of those speeches.

Mr. HOAR. I am quite sure of that; but I suggest that we read through these twelve pages, which will probably take ten or twelve minutes, unless there are some amendments, and then adjourn, leaving the amendments of which notice has been given to be offered to-morrow.

Mr. BAYARD. How long does the Senator suppose that will occupy?

Mr. HOAR. Ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. BAYARD. I withdraw the motion, understanding that in ten minutes we shall reach the point indicated by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senate to allow me to offer an amendment to come in at the end of the bill, so that I may have it printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the amendment to be proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] will be received, ordered to be printed, and lie on the table. It is so ordered. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. COKE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. It is after 5 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Senator from Texas will let us read through these sections on corporations and composition. They are not likely to suggest any amendment. It will only take a very few minutes. Considering the good-nature——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas withdraw the motion?

Mr. COKE. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is withdrawn. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Secretary read section 93.

Mr. HOAR. In line 5 of section 93 I wish to make a verbal amendment, instead of "corporators" inserting the word "stockholders." I understand that in some States the term "corporators" has a technical meaning and is confined to those who attend the first meeting and organize the company.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the alteration suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts will be made. The Chair hears none. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The Secretary read sections 94, 95, and 96.

Mr. HOAR. In section 96, line 6, after "therefor," the word "and" should be inserted; so as to read:

At least ten days before the time appointed therefor, and of the substance of said proposal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and that amendment will be made.

Sections 97 to 103, inclusive, were read.

Mr. HOAR. I ask leave to go back to section 100, and move to strike out the portion of that section after the word "control," in line 5. That section gives the court of bankruptcy jurisdiction over a compounding debtor to enforce the payment of the composition—and that I think is right—and over trustees and other officers of the court who have his property in their control; but it goes on to provide that "the district and circuit courts shall have jurisdiction concurrently with the State courts of all suits against indorsers, sureties, or others bound for such payments," &c. It has been suggested to me by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] that in many parts of the country there will be great objection to increasing the jurisdiction of the Federal courts, giving them jurisdiction over suits on common notes and contracts of that kind between citizens of the same State. Indeed, I doubt whether we should have the constitutional right to do it. I move to strike out that part of the section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to returning to section 100, as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts striking out all of the section after the word "control," in line 5. The words proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "control," in line 5, it is proposed to strike out:

And the district and circuit courts shall have jurisdiction concurrently with the State courts of all suits against indorsers, sureties, or others bound for such payments, and upon the property so bound in all matters pertaining to such composition.

The amendment was agreed to.

Sections 104 to 106, inclusive, were read.

Mr. HOAR. I shall move to fill the blanks in section 106 when the bill comes into the Senate and is about to be finally disposed of. The word "hereinbefore," in line 25 of section 106, should be stricken out. I move to strike it out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. The latter portion of section 106, providing for proceedings under the act of 1867, received favorable action by the Committee on the Judiciary, and now stands on the Calendar as Senate bill No. 1362, with a proviso that was agreed to by the Committee on the Judiciary, but that does not appear in this section. I move to insert after the word "mentioned," in line 36, these words:

Provided, That if on application under this section the court find that it would be unjust to any party in interest to compel such final determination within the time herein specified, the court may extend the time for some term to be specified in its order, beyond which there shall be no further delay in such determination.

The amendment was agreed to.

Section 107 was read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill is concluded.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 2 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 16, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Mr. DIBBLE. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report a substitute for a resolution referred to that committee, and to ask for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The original resolution will be read, and then the proposed substitute.

The original resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to furnish to this House copies of all orders, reports, recommendations, correspondence, and other papers on file in the Treasury Department relating to the purchase of a site for a public building in the city of Brooklyn and State of New York.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Whereas a resolution was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds relative to the purchase of a site for a public building in Brooklyn, N. Y.; and

Whereas at a hearing before said committee specific charges were made, in writing, and filed with said committee, alleging complicity between some of the officers of the Government and the owners of real estate in said city, whereby it is alleged that the Government is likely to be required to pay an exorbitant price for the contemplated site; and

Whereas it is due to the Government as well as to the officers implicated that the facts should be ascertained: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is requested to furnish to this House copies of all orders, reports, recommendations, correspondence, and other papers on file relative to the purchase or contemplated purchase of a site for a public building in the city of Brooklyn, N. Y., and that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to investigate the charges made, with power to send for persons and papers; and that the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to suspend negotiations for the purchase of said property pending the investigation.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] some of the reasons why it is proposed to authorize the committee to send for persons and papers. My understanding about the matter is that $800,000 was appropriated for a building at Brooklyn, and when the matter of the purchase of the site came to be considered it was found that the price of land there was so very high that the amount appropriated was not sufficient to pay for the land and complete the building, and therefore nothing has been done. I would like to know of the gentleman in charge of this resolution whether there was anything more serious?

Mr. DIBBLE. The reasons which actuated the committee were simply these——

Mr. BEACH. I do not want the right to object to be waived.

The SPEAKER. The right to object will not be waived.

Mr. DIBBLE. We were furnished with a sworn statement of the valuation of the property by an expert, together with a sworn statement of the assessed value of the property on the tax-books of Brooklyn. Each of these valuations was a great deal less than the price which we were informed was set upon the property negotiated for.

We were also furnished with the names of witnesses, residents of Brooklyn, who from our best information were responsible and reliable, and could give further light upon this matter. The committee think it due to the officers of the Government implicated and to the Government itself that the matter should be investigated. And as the names of witnesses were furnished, and we ascertained that they were reliable persons, we accordingly added to the resolution the clause giving power to the committee to send for persons and papers.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand the gentleman to say that the chief complaint is that the property is now held at a higher sum than it was understood at the time the bill was passed it could be obtained for, higher than it is really worth.

Mr. DIBBLE. The complaint is that the gentleman appointed by the United States Government to negotiate as its agent for this property was personally interested in the property sought to be purchased. That is a part of the complaint.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I desire to ask the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] if the resolution reported by the committee has received the approval of the Representatives from the city of Brooklyn; have they been consulted in reference to the action proposed by the committee?

Mr. DIBBLE. I understand they have been consulted.

Mr. HOPKINS. The resolution was originally offered by one of the Representatives from that city.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I know that my colleague from the city of Brooklyn [Mr. JAMES], who is absent from the House this morning, feels a deep interest in this matter, and I would like to know whether he has been consulted in reference to it.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I will say that hearing these reports, receiving letters from many citizens of Brooklyn, and understanding that another gentleman would offer the resolution if some one from Brooklyn did not, I offered the resolution and it was referred to the appropriate committee. It is in the hands of a good committee, and whatever they think proper will satisfy me. I have nothing further to say upon it.

Mr. HOPKINS. The Supervising Architect of the Treasury, having heard of these allegations, came to the Capitol a few days ago and said he could not permit himself to remain under these charges, and therefore he desired this investigation. I will ask in this connection, as having had some influence upon the committee reporting this resolution, to have read two extracts from a leading journal of New York city.

Mr. REED. The point is, has the gentleman from Brooklyn, Mr. JAMES, who represents the district in which this property is situated, been consulted with regard to this resolution?

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I shall object to the resolution until my colleague is present.

Mr. REED. I think that is right.

Mr. BEACH. Mr. JAMES told me he had no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the resolution is not before the House.

BRIDGE ACROSS SAINT CROIX RIVER.

Mr. PRICE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar for present consideration Senate bill 1797, authorizing the construction of a railroad bridge across the Saint Croix River, in the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota. It is for the construction of a bridge 2,000 feet long and 50 feet above high-water mark. It is important for the progress of the enterprise that the bill should be promptly passed. It was passed by the Senate and reported from the Committee on Commerce last Saturday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that the bill is not at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. PRICE. Was it not reported back from the Committee on Commerce last Saturday?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that it was not.

Mr. PRICE. Then I beg pardon for taking up the time of the House. I thought the bill had been reported back and was in the possession of the Clerk.

ANNUAL SALARIES FOR COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. FORNEY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts be, and they are hereby, directed to inquire into the propriety of paying annual salaries to such committee clerks as are now paid by the session, and to report to this House by bill or otherwise such amount as they may deem a fair annual salary.

BUSINESS FROM FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE.

Mr. CURTIN. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to ask consent to submit for present consideration the resolution which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That April 29 be set aside for the consideration of business from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, not to interfere with general appropriation or revenue bills, or business from the Committee on Public Lands; and should said day be occupied by the consideration of business from the Committee on Public Lands, general revenue or appropriation bills, then the next unoccupied day shall be devoted to the consideration of business from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the introduction of this resolution for present consideration?

Mr. MORRISON. I object.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SNYDER, for four days.

To Mr. WILKINS, for the remainder of this week, on account of important business.

To Mr. KEIFER, for ten days after to-day.

To Mr. STORM, until Tuesday next, on account of important business.
To Mr. O'HARA, for fifteen days from to-day.

REPRINT OF INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT BILL.

On motion of Mr. DORSHEIMER, by unanimous consent, it was ordered that the bill (H. R. 2418), now on the House Calendar, granting copyrights to citizens of foreign countries, be reprinted with an amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary.

SESSIONS OF COMMITTEE ON PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. CASSIDY. I am instructed by the Committee on Pacific Railroads to ask that the committee have leave to sit during the sessions of the House.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

TARIFF HEARINGS BEFORE WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask unanimous consent to report back a resolution from the Committee on Ways and Means.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of each member of the House one copy of the hearings had before and testimony taken by the Committee on Ways and Means on what is known as the Morrison tariff bill.

The report of the committee, accompanying the resolution, was read, as follows:

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred for consideration a resolution for the reprint of the hearings lately had before said committee, report the following substitute:

"That there be printed for the use of Congress 1,000 copies of the said hearings, two copies each for each Member of Congress and each Senator, and the remaining copies for the Committee on Ways and Means."

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I suggest whether the phraseology of this resolution is proper where it says "for each Member of Congress and each Senator."

The SPEAKER. Senators are members of Congress. Is there objection to the present consideration of this subject? The Chair hears none.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution; and the substitute reported by the Committee on Ways and Means was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. BLOUNT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JEANNETTE INVESTIGATION.

Mr. COX, of New York. I rise to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX, of New York. I have here a resolution proposing to allow the chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs examining in regard to the Jeannette expedition to swear witnesses. This proposition simply follows precedent.

Mr. BEACH. Is there not before the House a bill covering this object?

Mr. COX, of New York. There is; but it has not yet passed.

Mr. BEACH. Why make this hearing a special matter?

Mr. COX, of New York. If the bill had passed we would not ask the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. BEACH. Can we not take up the general bill and pass it?

Mr. COX, of New York. We only ask this privilege as a temporary matter for a few days.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this is not a matter of privilege, but if there be no objection the resolution can be considered.

Mr. COX, of New York. Let it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs, now investigating the Jeannette expedition, be authorized to appoint subcommittees, to be composed of not less than three members, which subcommittees shall be committees of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this resolution?

Mr. COX, of New York. The object is simply to allow the chairman of the subcommittee to swear witnesses in the investigation of the Jeannette expedition. The adoption of the resolution will save the chairman of the committee the necessity of going in constantly for that purpose. This is all there is of it.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered, and adopted.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (S. 503) to increase the endowment of the University of Alabama from the public lands in said State; when the Speaker signed the same.

BUSINESS OF JUDICIARY COMMITTEE.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask to introduce for present consideration the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, the 3d of May, after the reading of the Journal, be assigned for the consideration of such business as may be presented by the Committee on the Judiciary; this order not to interfere with the consideration of general appropriation or revenue bills or prior special orders.

Mr. CLAY. I object.

ATTORNEYS' FEES IN PENSION CLAIMS.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, on last Saturday the Committee on Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay matured a measure which it instructed me to offer, at the proper time, as a substitute for the second section of the pension appropriation bill which was under consideration last week, and went over as unfinished business. In order that members may examine it, I ask unanimous consent that it may be published in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The proposed amendment is as follows:

A bill to regulate attorneys' fees in pension claims.

SECTION 1. That no agent, attorney, or other person shall receive any fee for his services in a pension claim until the payment of the pension.

SEC. 2. That all fees in pension claims shall be paid by the agent for paying pensions out of the first installment of pension due the claimant, and no agent, attorney, or other person shall receive any fee for his services in a pension claim except through the agent for paying pensions.

SEC. 3. That the fee in all pension claims shall be $10, except in case of special written contract, filed in the Pension Office and approved by the Commissioner of Pensions, as hereinafter provided. The claimant may contract with his attorney of record, in writing, in such form as the Commissioner of Pensions may prescribe, for a fee to an amount not exceeding $25, except in claims for increase of pension where no new disability is alleged, in cases of pensions for service, and in all claims filed in the Pension Office after June 28, 1878, and prior to the passage of this act, in which cases no fee above $10 shall be contracted for; and in all claims filed prior to the passage of this act the attorney shall file a statement, under oath, duly attested, setting forth the amount of fee already received by him, and the amount already received shall be deducted from the fee allowed by this act.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Interior shall have power to make such regulations as may be deemed proper in regard to the admission of persons to practice as attorneys before the Pension Office, the conduct of attorneys, and the suspension or disbarment of improper persons from practice.

SEC. 5. That any agent or attorney, or other person instrumental in prosecuting any claim for pension, who shall directly or indirectly contract for, demand, or receive, or retain, any compensation for his services or instrumentality for prosecuting a claim for pension greater than is herein provided, or in any other manner than herein provided, or shall willfully or knowingly make a false statement in regard to the amount of fee already received, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall for every such offense be fined not exceeding $1,000, or be confined at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both, at the discretion of the court.

POSTAL-TELEGRAPH BILL.

Mr. ROSECRANS. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent that the resolution of the Legislature of California heartily indorsing the postal-telegraph bill, introduced by my colleague [Mr. SUMNER], be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. COSGROVE. That subject has been acted on by the proper committee, and I must object.

BUSINESS OF THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE.

Mr. TUCKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] who objected to the consideration of my resolution has withdrawn his objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again submit the question to the House. Is there objection?

Mr. MORRISON. Yes; I object.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not before the House.

TARIFF.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. That requires a two-thirds vote.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 89, noes 8.

So (two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the morning hour was dispensed with.

Mr. MORRISON. I move the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in committee for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5893) to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] is entitled to the floor.

When Mr. RUSSELL had spoken for an hour,

The CHAIRMAN said: The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that such extension of time may be granted to the gentleman from Massachusetts as he may desire.

Mr. BEACH. I shall object to an extension of time for any gentleman.

Mr. RUSSELL. I would like a few moments more.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman may be allowed five minutes more at least.

Mr. BEACH. There are a large number of gentlemen who wish to speak.

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman from Massachusetts is a member of the committee which has had these questions under consideration, and I ask the gentleman from New York not to insist upon his objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York insist on his objection?

Mr. BEACH. On consideration I will defer to the wishes of the gentlemen around me and withdraw my objection.

Mr. RUSSELL. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. If there is no intention on the part of members on this [Republican] side of the House to endeavor to prevent amendment to this bill after general debate shall have closed, I will have no objection to extending the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL]; but if there is such intention, then I shall object to what will be only a waste of time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not make a conditional objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts have such additional time as he may desire.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to extending the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, by the action of the Ways and Means Committee in reporting to the House the Morrison bill, so called, and now by the action of the House itself, we are again brought face to face with the tariff issue, and the business interests of the country are again plunged into uncertainty and distress. The appointment of a commission and the consideration and revision of the tariff laws in the last Congress held the business of the country in suspense for a full year. The work of the commission and the action of the Forty-seventh Congress in the passage of the tariff act of March 3, 1883, restored confidence in the business community, and the ax in the forests, the pick and shovel in the mines, and the various industries everywhere resumed their usual activity.

It was not expected that this work so well though not perfectly done, and these laws so important and so sensitive to the material interests of the country, were to be again, within a twelvemonth, reopened and reagitated. But it has come, and why? Is there a call coming up from the people for this? Has any interest or any section of the country asked for the reintroduction of this disturbing element? Is there any appeal, by petition or otherwise, for the reopening and revision of our tariff laws? There is but one response to this question, No!

I might except the Free Trade Club of New York, who did appear in favor of the Morrison bill and argued for free trade generally.

We turn our ear to the South and what do we hear? They say "we want no change in the tariff as it relates to our great products, sugar, rice, tobacco, iron ore, and the manufacture of cotton goods." We turn our ears to the West and they say, "Since we have found that we can profitably manufacture sugar from sorghum and glucose from corn, we wish you to make haste slowly in any change in the sugar duties, and we want the same protection for our great staple, wool, and our iron ore, copper, lead, and lumber, and the various manufactures into which our people are now rapidly engaging." We turn our ears to the North and East and to the Middle States, the great manufacturing centers of the country, and they, with but one voice, say, "Though the reductions made in 1883 tend to cripple and discourage some of our industries, we hope Congress will give the new law a full and fair trial."

The testimony before the committee, asked for and fully and intelligently given by the representatives of the leading industries, as well as by men representing the working classes of the country, should satisfy every legislator that the interests of all classes of our people will be best promoted by letting the tariff laws alone for the present. The varying conditions of manufacture and trade may require, from time to time, changes in our tariff laws, but no such sweeping changes as proposed by the Morrison bill are demanded to-day.

WHO IS FORCING THIS ISSUE?

Why and by whom, then, has the consideration of this question been forced upon Congress and the people at this time? Plainly by the leading members of the Democratic party, and to clothe them with a living issue to present to the people in the coming Presidential contest. We, the protectionist party, accept the challenge; we stand by and are ready to go to the people with our tariff policy—the law so adjusted as to insure revenue to the Government and protection to American industry—while you still adhere to your obscure and deceptive theories, "a tariff for revenue only," and "a tariff for revenue with incidental protection." Your platform declarations on this question are vague and misleading. There is no such thing as "incidental" protection. There may be accidental protection, but not incidental.

COMPARATIVE COST OF MILL AND OPERATION.

To illustrate: A mill of a given capacity may be erected in England for at most two-thirds the cost of one of the same capacity here. It can be operated in England for less cost for labor, taxes, insurance, &c., than here. Mr. Arnold B. Sanford, of Fall River, Mass., the largest fine-yarn spinner in this country, testified before the Ways and Means Committee that from his knowledge by personal investigation a cotton-mill costing $450,000 here could be erected for $300,000 in England. He also said that he paid on his mill at Fall River for local, county, and State taxation $7,500 per annum, and that the taxes for a similar mill in England would not exceed $1,400. The system of taxation in England is adjusted to favor the manufacturing interest. And he says, "I pay 33½ per cent. more for my labor than is paid in England."

Without a duty imposed upon the product of such a mill the American mill can not run in competition with the English. To insure the operation of our own works a duty is imposed upon the manufactured article at a point which counterbalances the difference between the excessive cost of the plant here and the greater amount paid for labor, insurance, taxes, &c., and those in England. The duty thus imposed insures its manufacture here, stops importation, and the tariff thus becomes protective. The free-traders then say it affords no revenue, as it has checked and even stopped the importation of the foreign article; the tariff rate, therefore, must be reduced to afford a revenue with incidental protection. But when thus reduced to permit importation our own works will cease to manufacture, the English goods will be imported, and the tariff upon the article has become under such circumstances a revenue tariff without protection.

I repeat, there is no such thing as incidental protection, but there may be between the beginning and the full establishment of our manufactures to supply our home demand a time when the tariff will afford both a revenue and protection; but this would be accidental, not incidental, for it would be temporary and not continuous.

ARTICLES OF LUXURY.

There are articles consumed largely by the rich, not absolutely essential to comfort and support, upon which to impose duties for revenue. A list of a few of such articles I give below, the table showing value of goods imported and revenue derived last year under present rates of duty:

| Article. | Value. | Duty. |
|---|---|---|
| Beer, ale, and porter | $1,146,796 74 | $511,462 51 |
| Diamonds, &c | 7,608,752 61 | 761,886 41 |
| Fancy articles (alabaster, &c.) | 1,665,680 71 | 641,467 71 |
| Fancy feathers and artificial flowers | 4,399,294 46 | 1,378,369 63 |
| Musical instruments | 1,486,251 15 | 446,099 79 |
| Paintings and statuary | 3,088,673 34 | 313,584 75 |
| Silk, piece goods and manufactured | 33,307,112 37 | 19,677,999 53 |
| Spirits and wines | 2,296,734 37 | 3,358,463 12 |
| Champagnes and wines | 4,603,723 61 | 2,219,672 18 |
| Other spirits, &c., and still-wines | 5,679,909 10 | 3,152,267 85 |
| Tobacco and cigars | 10,515,806 00 | 7,700,458 34 |
| Braids, laces, &c., for ornamenting hats | 2,297,962 00 | 704,890 66 |
| Laces, cords, braids, gimps | 6,392,257 90 | 2,237,348 06 |
| Chinaware, decorated | 2,587,545 03 | 1,294,337 06 |
| Cotton embroideries | 4,928,775 37 | 1,725,607 78 |
| Meerschaum pipes | 38,305 74 | 32,671 11 |
| Fire-crackers | 265,023 97 | 281,148 08 |
| Fruits and nuts | 18,157,686 79 | 4,609,883 38 |
| Fine cut-glass ware | 1,017,677 84 | 407,075 04 |
| Fire-arms | 1,336,327 28 | 467,738 75 |
| Total | 112,815,356 28 | 51,922,431 74 |

The increased importation of this class of goods has been for the past two years at the rate of $10,000,000 per annum. Higher rates of duty might be imposed and larger revenues derived therefrom.

THE ISSUE AT HAND.

The time has come when the true position of the two great political parties on this question of the tariff should be fully and plainly understood. Both parties should clearly and boldly assert their positions. Let the people no longer be deceived by meaningless and deceptive platforms. Let now the protective features of the tariff be submitted to the people in the next national election. If after a fair and full discussion they desire to eliminate from the tariff laws the element of protection for protection, let them assume the responsibility, choose between the two systems and parties, and accept the consequences.

REASONS FOR PROTECTION.

Grounds for maintaining tariff laws which shall have a purpose both for revenue and protection are manifold, and have been presented in many forms before. There are no new reasons. Old ones can therefore only be reclothed and presented in new language.

In treating of this question in its very earliest history our forefathers recognized the importance of the protective as well as the revenue features of the tariff, and the policy of protection has been recognized ever since it was instituted as forming a part of the issues of the various political parties. With the Whig party it was its leading issue, and it has been one of the leading tenets of the Republican party since its formation.

As people live and learn so do nations, and we as a new people, coming after, have the experiences of older nations to follow or reject as our wisdom may dictate.

To be sure we have never experienced the results of absolute free trade, but the experience of others and our own attempts to approach it have been severe enough to warn us of its danger.

England has experimented with both protection and free trade. Owing to her peculiar situation and limited territory she has for a time prospered under the latter, but has reached that period in her history when it has become a present and serious question whether she can maintain her social, if she can her financial, position with the now more progressive nations of the world.

I have some excellent English authority showing the unrest there exists to-day in England on this question of free trade. At a public meeting in Birmingham, March 5 last, Earl Dunraven said:

It is claimed that England has benefited greatly by free trade. The great strides she made after the abolition of the corn laws are all attributed to the change in our fiscal system. There were, however, many other causes at work besides free trade. Free trade was of great profit to us at one time for the simple reason that we had the monopoly of the world's markets. Other nations had no means of supplying themselves with goods. They had to buy from us, and, consequently, as our market was assured and there was no difficulty in selling, it was an immense benefit to us to be able to buy everything as cheaply as possible. Since then things have materially altered. Foreign nations have learned to supply themselves and are beginning to supply us. The whole of the circumstances have changed, and to say that the system which benefited us under these circumstances must be equally beneficial in altered circumstances is absurd.

It is as absurd as to say that the clothing and food most suited to persons near the North Pole must consequently be the best food and clothing for people who live in the tropics. But there is another thing to be considered. It is true that England made great strides under free trade; it is equally true that other nations made greater strides under protection. The United States increased £165,000,000 in accumulated wealth; France, £75,000,000; and Great Britain, £65,000,000. In percentage of trade the increase of Great Britain was 21 per cent., and that of the United States was 67 per cent. In fact, England was the last of the great nations instead of the first.

The number of pronounced anti-free-traders in England now is, I should think, at least a hundred times what it was in 1879, and whether that means anything I leave to others to determine. There may not be enough yet to alter the policy of the country, but there are enough to do a good deal of leavening among the masses.

SIGNS OF PROSPERITY.

At present our industrial interests are in an abnormal condition, brought about through fear as to the action this Congress may take in relation to the tariff law. If you remove this disturbing element and let the country resume its normal condition we shall continue to present to the world as an object lesson the best, most prosperous, and most happy nation on the face of the globe.

It is said that the material growth and prosperity of a country can be measured by its consumption of iron and steel. Measured by this standard we excel all nations of the world in greatness and prosperity, for we consume more iron and steel per capita than any other people. Our economic system, which thus affords such opportunities for material gains, also leads up to intellectual growth and culture, and if we measure the intellectual standard of our people as compared with others by a well-recognized rule—the consumption of paper—we shall find that we stand at the head of all nations.

Great Britain, with a population of 35,000,000, manufactured and consumed in 1881 about 374,000,000 pounds of paper; France in the same year, with a population of 37,000,000, manufactured and consumed 325,000,000 pounds; Germany, with a population of 45,000,000, consumed 396,000,000 pounds, while the United States, with a population of about 50,000,000, consumed in the census year 865,000,000 pounds, or nearly twice as much per capita as either of the three countries above named.

It is not wholly our climate which has made us so prosperous; it is not wholly our race, for we are varied; it is not wholly our natural resources, though they all help to make our success possible, but the underlying basis of it all is in the wise laws which force such a diversity of interests and at the fullest possible compensation for labor.

DIRECT ADVANTAGES OF PROTECTION.

The standard of reward for labor, from the poorest paid to the highest talent, is enlarged and fixed by the tariff laws of the country. So few deny that labor is better paid by at least 50 per cent. in this country than elsewhere that it would seem unnecessary to offer proof on this point, though I insert tables for comparison.

The great controversy, therefore, between those who believe in protection and those who believe in free trade is based mainly on the question of the purchasing power of the higher wages paid in this country. To this the very patent fact that no American-born laborer ever finds occasion to leave his country to improve his condition, while on the other hand so many from every country on the face of the globe leave their own and seek refuge and a home among us, ought to be a sufficient answer, but I insert a statement from Mulhall's (English) Dictionary of Statistics (London, 1884), Wages, page 462, showing the comparative wages paid in some industries in Great Britain and New York; also a comparative statement as to cost of living.

Though our system of government offers better opportunities for advancement in social life than the homes of the emigrants, you will find by personal conversation with them that it is the material advantages we offer that attract them here.

The proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] in his recent speech in this House, that he could sit down with any intelligent mechanic and figure out to him that he would be as well off with less wages under free trade here as he is to-day, will probably not induce a single person to leave this country and seek protection under a different system, or deter a single individual from joining the great army who are annually moving to better their estate under our system, which he condemns. And the gentleman further says, arguing as to the financial condition of the immigrants:

> The terrible pauper laborer of Europe not infrequently seems to be able to save enough money to transport himself and his family across ocean and land four or five or six thousand miles to homestead or pre-empt the soil that our protected skilled labor is unable to reach.

While it is true that some of the emigrants come here with small means the great body of them are helped here through the money earned by those that have preceded them.

The distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON], chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, in his speech on this floor yesterday says:

> Estimates based on the census statistics show that as many as 18,000,000 of our people do some work or are occupied in some business; that the average earnings of at least 16,000,000 of these do not much exceed $300 per year, and are wholly consumed in means of daily subsistence. These, too, are the millions who in shop and field strike the blows of all production. All the accumulations of and boasted additions to our national and individual wealth go to one-tenth of those who earn it.

The gentleman has no authority for this statement; it can not be borne out by statistics; there is plenty of data to show the fallacy of this position.

I had occasion in the discussion of the tariff question in the last Congress to look up the financial condition of the workingmen, or such as he classes with those who work in the shops and mills, and I beg the indulgence of the House to again refer to the statement. I ascertained that in the cities of Lowell and Lawrence, where there is a population of 100,000 people employed by and maintained upon the wages paid in the various mills of these two cities, there was deposited in the savings-banks about $17,000,000. I also found that nearly seven-eighths of these deposits belonged to the wage laborers of these two cities. I made a comparison with Manchester, England, where I thought the population was more nearly engaged in like pursuits than any other city, and found that in Manchester, with 350,000 population, three and one-half times as great as that of Lowell and Lawrence, they had less than one-half as much money in the savings-banks.

I subjoin the statement:

> Lowell is about twenty-five miles from the seacoast, with an area of about 7,000 acres. It has a population of 60,000, the largest in the State or in the United States wholly engaged in the manufacture of textile fabrics, and therefore well illustrates the condition of the industrial classes in our New England manufacturing centers.
> Of the 60,000 inhabitants 22,559 are employed in the various corporations and mills. There are seven banks of discount, with a capital of $2,500,000. There are six savings-banks, with a total deposit of $11,646,212 to the credit of 33,408 depositors. Of this number 1,735 are depositors of amounts above $300, and 31,673 depositors of $300 and under, showing how general the habit of saving has become among our people, and what a large proportion of the funds in the savings-banks are the earnings of the wage laborers. I have it from authority that about seven-eighths of the deposits in these savings-banks are the laid-by earnings of the wage laborers.

In Lawrence, with a population of 40,000, grown up wholly out of manufacturing and now supported by it, we find a like result. There are 13,000 operatives, three savings-banks with $5,000,000 deposits and 13,728 depositors.

Manchester, England, corresponds with these two cities in its occupations more nearly than any other. Let us contrast the condition of its people: Manchester, with a population of 341,508, has in its various savings-banks £1,434,140, or $6,883,872; a city three and a half times as large as Lowell and Lawrence, and less than one-half the amount of deposits in its saving institutions. I commend these facts to the other side of this House, who claim that the wage laborers in this country are no better off with our wages and cost of living than those of England.

This is not exceptional. It is a fair representative picture of New England and other manufacturing towns and cities, and like results will follow manufacturing as it may be established in different sections of the country, if cared for and protected as under our present system. I find that in the fourteen States that have made returns to the Comptroller of the Currency, Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, District of Columbia, Ohio, Indiana, and California (there is no data for any other), there is in the savings banks over one thousand million dollars ($1,024,856,787) to the credit of 2,876,433 depositors, an average of $356.29 to each depositor. This small average shows that the money, to a great extent, is not the property of capitalists, but the result of small savings. This is the report for 1883 and shows an increase over 1882 of more than fifty-eight million dollars ($58,059,706), in which each of the States named has shared. We have thus disposed of 2,732,595 of this 16,000,000 persons who the gentleman states consumes their whole earnings in subsistence.

Mr. HERBERT. Does the gentleman mean to be understood as saying that all of the money deposited in the savings-banks in the cities he refers to is the property of the laborers?

Mr. RUSSELL. I stated that seven-eighths of the deposits in the savings-banks was the property of the wage laborers of these cities.

Mr. HERBERT. How do you get at that fact? From the census figures? I should like to be informed.

Mr. RUSSELL. I learned of that fact through the treasurers of the savings institutions, who made that estimate. There is other evidence that goes to confirm this statement; that is, that in Lowell, where there were 33,408 depositors, 31,673 were depositors of amounts of $300 and under. This information I get from the official bank reports.

Now, Mr. Chairman, coming to that very numerous class of our population, those engaged in farming, whose rights and interests the gentleman from Illinois so ably and zealously guards, and a part of the 16,000,000 whom he says receive and consume annually in subsistence their whole earnings, 7,670,493 in number, I find that of the taxable real estate of the country, $13,036,766,925, they possess, in farms and farm buildings, $10,197,096,776, or three-fourths of the entire amount. I find by the census returns that there are 4,008,907 farms in the United States, averaging 134 acres each. I thank the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] for the opportunity he has afforded me to show that this hard-working and deserving class of our citizens, the land-holders, have garnered to themselves so large a share of the solid wealth of the country. Statements of the other property of the country are largely estimated, but whatever it may be, they own, as shown by the census returns, in farm implements and machinery, $406,476,055; in live-stock, $1,500,384,707.

I shall also reproduce in this connection a statement I made in regard to the percentage of women and children employed at farm and mill labor in Great Britain and the United States:

Our population as shown by the Tenth Census is not yet classified into occupations, but the proportion of males and females employed in the different industries has not probably materially changed from that shown in the Ninth Census. I find that in 1870 there were engaged in agricultural pursuits in the United States 5,225,503 males and 396,968 females—14 males to 1 female. By official returns of the industries of Great Britain and Ireland the proportion engaged in agriculture there at that time was as 6 to 1—6 males to 1 female.

In the United States the number engaged in manufacturing, mechanical, and mining industries was, males, 2,353,471; females, 353,950—7 males to 1 female. There were engaged in the same pursuits, at the same time, in Great Britain and Ireland 2 males to 1 female.

The proportion of children employed in manufacturing industries indicates more forcibly the straits to which the people of these countries are put to obtain a livelihood. The statistics showing the number of children employed in manual labor in the United Kingdom and this country are not computed on the same basis as to age. Those in Great Britain and Ireland are taken at 20 years and under, while those in the United States are taken at 16 and under.

I find that of the 2,707,421 persons engaged in manufacturing and mining in the United States, 75,643 are children under 16 years of age. And twice this number for those between 16 and 20, to bring the calculation on the same basis with Great Britain and Ireland, and we have 226,929, or 12 adults to 1 child. In Great Britain and Ireland in a total of 6,425,137 engaged in like pursuits, 1,567,716 are children under 20 years—or 4 adults to 1 child.

In England the proportion of children engaged in the above-named pursuits is about 2 males to 1 female; in Scotland 1¼ males to 1 female, and in Ireland 1½ females to 1 male. The percentage of female children to male is greater in Ireland and Scotland than in England, and you will observe the very much greater percentage of female children laborers in the two former than in the latter country.

The above statement is confirmed by further examination of the census.

Mr. TUCKER (interrupting). Engaged in labor?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes, sir. They represent boys and girls of twenty years and under, but they are called children in the statistics.

INDIRECT ADVANTAGES OF PROTECTION.

A law, whether natural or otherwise, that compels a diversity of interest, that shall confine within our own borders the production of food and the manufacture of nearly everything required for comfort or the necessaries of life, so far tends to enlighten, and makes possible the highest standard of civilization, and this very important feature of the result of protection should not be lost sight of in considering this question.

The motives which actuated those who first sought our shores and commenced the settlement of this country were of a social order, the desire for greater freedom of religious and political thought. But the simple pursuits of agriculture which seemed the only ones possible in the earliest history of the country were not sufficient to insure our highest development, and our forefathers, seeing this, instituted those laws which made it possible to introduce and engage our people in mechanical pursuits as well as agricultural; and the continuance of manufacturing here to supply the wants of those engaged in agriculture created that competition one country with another which has brought down the cost of the manufactured article year by year and day by day to a point lower than would have existed under any other circumstances. It would, perhaps, be questioning their foresight to say "they builded better than they knew."

Our first President, Washington, saw the importance of protection and was outspoken in its advocacy.

Washington, in his first message, January 8, 1790, said:

The advancement of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures by all proper means will not, I trust, need recommendation, but I can not forbear intimating to you the expediency of giving effectual encouragement as well to the introduction of new and useful inventions from abroad as to the exertions of skill and genius in producing them at home.

In another message, December 7, 1796, Washington said:

Ought our country to remain dependent upon foreign supply—precarious, because liable to be interrupted? If the necessary article should in this case cost more in time of peace, will not the security and independence thence arising form an ample compensation?

EFFECT OF HOME COMPETITION.

Special lines of goods like the French cotton prints have heretofore only reached consumers in this country at a high cost, held so not only by the manufacturers themselves controlling the market and the price, but also by the importers, who have control of these special lines and deal them to our people through high commissions.

Establishing the manufacture of any of these articles here breaks up any combination of the foreign manufacturers and the importers to exact unreasonable profits, which insures cheaper goods to the American people. This can be illustrated by a great variety of articles imported. I will cite one or two instances.

A letter by Messrs. Arnold, Constable & Co., importers, and in favor of free trade, written to Mr. HEWITT, and printed as part of the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means, as an argument for a reduction of duties, shows as conclusively as anything I can offer the effect of American competition with foreign goods in reducing their cost to the consumer. The letter is as follows:

[Arnold, Constable & Co., New York. Paris, 21 rue d'Hauteville. Lyon, 8 Quai St. Clair. Manchester, 41 Lower Mosley st.]

NEW YORK, February 20, 1884.

DEAR SIR: Mr. Dalton stated before your committee that a change in cottons would prevent the manufacturers in this country from making the finer kinds of cottons, such as sateens. I send you some samples to controvert what Mr. Dalton says:

Sample A is American, 36 inches wide; cost by the case 11¼ cents per yard; the pattern is French.

Sample B is French, 32 inches wide, 4 inches narrower than the American; cost to land 18¼ cents. You will see we can no longer import the plain French cloth.

Sateens were gotten up by one of the best French manufacturers especially for us in the spring of 1882, when we had the market almost entirely to ourselves. In the spring of 1883 the Americans copied the cloth, and printed them very extensively, and are going on with them again this season.

In the spring of 1883 the Americans greatly undersold the French article, and our importations were sold without any profit, and in some instances at a considerable loss. We have been driven from the market; therefore the Americans need not fear the reduction which the committee proposes.

For the spring of 1884 we have imported sateens in very small quantity, but have produced some cottons of an entirely different weave, which we suppose will be copied next spring.

C sample, American sateen, 32 inches wide, the case price of which is 27 cents, at which price it is supposed to pay the manufacturer a profit, as he would not sell so early in the season without.

D sample, French sateen, 32 inches wide, cost to land 31½ cents.

Sincerely yours,

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE & CO.

Hon. A. S. HEWITT.

P. S.—The American has more weight than the French, but the finish is not quite as good.

Arnold, Constable & Co. say, "You will see we can no longer import the plain French cloth." Well, I don't see how they can. The American article is selling for 11¼ cents, and it costs 18½ to lay down a like article from France.

Mr. MORRISON. How much of that is duty?

Mr. RUSSELL. The duty and cost of importation may amount to fully as much as the difference between the price of the two. I do not offer this as an argument against the reduction of 20 per cent. on this particular article of manufacture to sustain its manufacture here, but offer it as an argument to show that the American manufacturers, the monopolists and the robbers of the people's money, of which we hear so much on this floor, do not take advantage and add the duty to the domestic article as they have opportunity, but are offering to the consumer goods at 11½ cents that it costs 18½ cents to import.

The tone and spirit of this letter is in criticism of the Americans who have entered into the manufacture of these goods here to the interruption of their trade and the enormous profits they were making upon the imported article.

In the spring of 1882, when these French goods or sateens [samples of which were exhibited by Mr. RUSSELL] were introduced into this market, they were retailed at 75 cents per yard, yielding a profit to the foreign manufacturer and the importer of about 140 per cent. The manufacture of these goods in this country, which was begun about a year after, has brought down the price of the French goods to the consumer to 45 cents per yard, or 40 per cent. from the highest price.

The gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, in his speech yesterday, referring to the cotton schedule, said, "The present rate on the finest cotton is 40 per cent., and yet it is an unquestioned fact, as shown by invoices and payments made, that duties exceeding 100 per cent., exceeding the first cost, are exacted and paid on cotton goods the duty on which is, in the estimates referred to, stated to be less than 20 per cent." This he declares is one of the enormities of the tariff, hidden and concealed in classification of articles and rates of duty. The gentleman refers to the class of cotton goods called crinoline, or a gauzy cotton cloth with but few threads to the square inch, very light in weight, and very low in value on the other side where manufactured. None are manufactured in this country. These goods under the old tariff came in in what was called the "basket clause," at 35 per cent. ad valorem. By a change in the classification of the cotton schedule it was found after the law was passed that these cheap goods, which formerly came in at 35 per cent., came in under a specific duty of 3½ cents per yard, which, considering their value, is something like 100 per cent. ad valorem. No one asked to have these goods so fully protected, for there are none manufactured in this country, and it was an oversight or accident. But it amounts to very little, though these goods, which cost so little abroad, and with the duty of 3½ cents per square yard cost not exceeding 7 or 8 cents to import, are sold by Arnold, Constable & Co. at 15 and 16 cents per yard. If this or a reasonable duty is maintained, the manufacture of this material will begin in this country, prices to the consumer be largely reduced, and this firm's business and profits again be disturbed.

Mr. MORRISON. That accident, if the gentleman will allow me to say, occurred first with the Tariff Commission. They made the change, and then the same accident happened in the committee and the conference.

Mr. RUSSELL. It was no less an accident or mistake. So that we find this charge of hidden enormities as far as it relates to the cotton schedule rests on a "gauzy" foundation.

Mr. HERBERT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him what became of that "basket clause" of 35 per cent.? I want to know what was done with it.

Mr. RUSSELL. The "basket clause" in the new law was raised for good and sufficient reasons. The old law gave importers an opportunity to evade the law; that is, change the styles or names of goods and then throw them into the "basket clause" at lower rates than they would otherwise pay; and the "basket clause" in the cotton schedule, as in all others, was made higher to prevent frauds.

Mr. HERBERT. What was done with it?

Mr. RUSSELL. The basket clause was raised. I forget the rate.

Mr. HERBERT. Raised by accident?

Mr. RUSSELL. No; I don't claim that the rate in the basket clause was raised by accident. It was fully discussed and understood in the committee. It was the crinoline or gauzy cotton cloths which I refer to whose classification was the accident.

Mr. DINGLEY. Do I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to say that no goods of this kind are made in this country?

Mr. RUSSELL. I am so informed.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then the duty is purely a revenue one and not protective.

Mr. STRUBLE. How long has sateen been manufactured here?

Mr. RUSSELL. Not long. Within two or three years.

Mr. AIKEN. Is that sateen? [Referring to samples exhibited.]

Mr. RUSSELL. It is.

If the article upon which the tariff is imposed is not manufactured here and entirely imported, then the duty is added to the cost of the article, and more than that, high commissions are added; but when the article is in part manufactured here the whole duty is not added to the cost of the domestic article. This shows conclusively that the competition here has forced the price of these articles much below the price of importation, and the fact that the duty is not wholly added to the cost of the domestic article can be illustrated or proved by almost every article manufactured in this country.

Information from a reliable source as to the wholesale price of well-known articles of woolen goods in 1860 and 1880 are given below:

|---|---|
| Middlesex bed blankets, per pair: | |
| Net wholesale price in 1860 | $2 75 |
| Net wholesale price in 1884 | 2 55 |
| Norway plains, all wool, bed blankets, per pair: | |
| Net wholesale price in 1860 | 4 00 |
| Net wholesale price in 1884 | 3 75 |
| Made-up horse blanket, Burlap lined: | |
| Wholesale price in 1860 | 2 00 |
| Wholssale price in 1884 | 1 20 |
| Fitchburg cassimeres, 27 inches wide, all wool, per yard: | |
| Wholesale price in 1860 | 1 05 |
| Wholesale price in 1884 | 92 |
| Haile & Frost cashmeretts, 27 inches wide, per yard: | |
| Average wholesale price in 1860 and for ten years previous | 51 |
| Wholesale price in 1884 | 42 |
| Fancy cassimeres, 27 inches wide, per yard: | |
| Wholesale price in 1860 | 65 |
| Wholesale price in 1884 | 50 |

The question then is very naturally asked, Why then maintain so high a duty? The answer is plain. In the first place you can not induce capital to invest in manufacturing in this country with the increased cost of plant and labor as compared with the foreign cost and meet the varying condition of trade brought about by a foreign policy or custom to send to us their surplus in seasons of overproduction with them, which would make our market, without a protective tariff, too uncertain and unstable to invite investment, and we should then be left wholly within the control of the foreign manufacturer and importer—a condition, as I have shown, not favorable for low prices.

Take the article bleaching-powders, now on the free-list and not manufactured in this country, though very extensively used in several industries, there having been imported in 1883, 94,395,405 pounds. The price of this article in this country in 1881–'82 was about 1 cent per pound. By a combination of the foreign manufacturers the price was carried up and is now maintained at about 2 cents per pound, or an advance of 100 per cent.

Mr. MORSE. Why not make it here?

Mr. RUSSELL. Because we have not the ingredients. It only shows that where we have not the materials, and are dependent wholly on the foreign market, we are at the mercy of foreign combinations.

Mr. MORSE. The same holds good of the Hecla and Calumet Mining Company, which will sell you copper at 12 cents if you send it abroad, but if you use it here they will charge you 15.

FREE RAW MATERIAL.

Mr. RUSSELL. The proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] that we shall have all raw material free is an ingenious, cunning device to undermine our tariff policy. It strikes directly at the foundation of the protective system, unless he confines his free trade in raw materials to those articles not produced in this country, which are few in number. The proposition to a farmer or miner that he shall not be protected in his products, whether it be wool, coal, ore, or products of his forests, or any other, while asking him to maintain a protective duty on the manufactured goods which he consumes, is unjust and unstatesmanlike, and to assert that this sentiment prevails to any extent among the manufacturers, and notably in New England, is not crediting them with the common fairness which they possess, and is not true. New England and the manufacturers are, to use a homely phrase, for the "live and let live" policy.

The attempt of the gentleman [Mr. HEWITT] to draw from the representatives of the manufacturing interests of New England an expression in favor of free raw materials has utterly failed. Mr. Charles H. Dalton, treasurer of one of our largest cotton-manufacturing establishments in New England and president of the Arkwright Club, an association of New England manufacturers, in his testimony before the Ways and Means Committee argues thus in regard to raw material:

> The theory that sundry domestic articles in their crude state are "raw materials," and should therefore be placed upon the free list, is plausible, but unsound in application. Coal, iron-ore, &c., appear upon the "Morrison" free-list by virtue, probably, of their being "raw materials." They are "raw" only so long as they remain undisturbed in their native beds. When coal is mined it has received its first manipulation; when transported to the furnace, its second; and when burned, its last. The labor and skill required for its mining and transportation is as much entitled to recognition in the policy of the Government as any other form of industry. There is no equity in saying to the men who work in a mine that they must accept foreign rates of wages or abandon their occupations, while any other applied labor is protected. The miner's work is as necessary to the public good as any other industry, and can not be degraded without degrading in some degree all labor.
> The manufacturer of textile fabrics in New England practically pays the wages of the miner and transporter of the coal he uses. Of the $5 per ton paid, all but the royalty to the mine-owner—25 cents or less—and the interest on investments in transportation lines is finally paid to the miners, engineers, train and boat men, and sailors employed in bringing the coal to his mills. In return these persons buy his cloth; they are his customers. If coal is put on the free-list, and if, consequently, the New England manufacturer is supplied from Nova Scotia, he will save, perhaps, 50 cents per ton, and lose a customer for four dollars' worth of his cloth, unless there should be reciprocity on the part of Nova Scotia, by which the New England cloth could be sold there.
> No such reciprocity is provided for, and, therefore, the New England manufacturer would be in the predicament of possibly making his cloth a shade cheaper with free coal, but with the certainty of losing his customers for a portion of his stuffs. For example, a manufacturer of an important cotton fabric would nominally save, under the "Morrison" free coal tariff, about one-fifth of one mill per yard upon his product, by buying Nova Scotia in place of Pennsylvania, Maryland, or Virginia coal, and would lose thereby customers for 2,000,000 yards of his cloth. Such a change does not commend itself to the manufacturer any more than to the American miner and transporter, especially as the gain on the cost of the cloth would be offset, probably, by the increase of cost consequent upon a reduced production.

This reasoning does not apply to articles used in manufactures which are not, or can not be, produced in this country. If any such articles are not already upon the free-list, they should be put there.

Mr. Edward H. Ammidown, a large manufacturer of woolen goods and dealer in domestic fabrics in New York city, who testified in relation to the woolen industry, said as to free wool:

My own idea is that free wool would impoverish the country to such an extent that people would not buy clothing. The wool production has increased in this country from 60,000,000 pounds to 320,000,000, and from a value of $20,000,000 to a value of $110,000,000. This production of $110,000,000 is so much clear money, and is more widely distributed probably than the product of any other industry. Every man who raises a pound of wool raises it to sell. That $110,000,000 of money, as distributed throughout the community, is $2 a head of money distributed out of the growth of wool in this country, with which people are enabled to buy clothing as well as other necessaries of life. If you cut off that production to any large extent (as you would do by free wool) you deprive the people of this country of a sum of money that is certainly equal to the interest on the national debt, and which they now have to support themselves and buy clothes with. And suppose that they can buy clothes 15 per cent. cheaper, they have not got the money to buy them with, or, at any rate, their supply of money is reduced more than 15 per cent. So that 15 per cent. reduction on the fabric does not begin to compare with the reduction of the people's means.

Grant for the sake of the argument that wool, lumber, coal, and the ores would be made cheaper (though I doubt if in the long run they would) by putting them on the free-list, you must reduce the wages of those engaged in raising wool, producing lumber, and mining your coal and ores, which will reduce the purchasing power of their wages and to that extent break down and reduce the home market for your manufacturers.

PURCHASING POWER OF WAGES.

There is paid out annually to those engaged in all pursuits at least $6,000,000,000. If you level the compensation for labor to the standard paid in other countries you would reduce this amount fully $2,000,000,000, which amount exceeds by nearly $500,000,000 your total exports of agriculture, manufacture, coin, and bullion ($825,846,813), together with the total imports of all merchandise, coin, and bullion ($751,670,305).

This $2,000,000,000 which free trade would strike off of your labor roll it can not be claimed would be counterbalanced or compensated for by cheaper merchandise, for this sum is equal to nearly one-half of the total value of all manufactured products in this country ($5,369,579,191), and nearly equal to the total value of all our farm products ($2,212,540,927). The fact is that this $6,000,000,000, compensating labor in this country, is not all absorbed by daily living in the purchase of either merchandise or food, but is the source from which is drawn the two and a half million dollars that is being daily added to the accumulated wealth of the country. It is a striking as well as a consoling fact that this tax and high-tariff burdened people are adding and holding to themselves one-third of the accumulated wealth of the whole world. One thing is certain: whatever of extra cost there may be to our people for goods of domestic manufacture, it does not go to the capital involved, for that is not receiving to-day as great a return as the capital engaged in trade and transportation, and is as low as at any other period in our history.

PROTECTION UNIVERSAL.

The protective policy has in it the elements of justice and equity, and if maintained at all must be universal in its application, or nearly so. I refer to the masses of the people. I do not mean that every individual may be reached by its beneficent influence. I can conceive how men who have built up a fortune and have invested it in bonds and mortgages at fixed rates, who measure day by day the purchasing power of their fixed income as they apply it to the articles of high living, may oppose our policy. In fact, the head and front of the free-trade leagues in the country, and notably the free-trade club of New York, are mainly constituted of people of this class.

I have at hand a list of the names of members of this club as it existed a few months ago. It may have increased in number recently, as I understand there have been strenuous efforts put forth to enlarge its membership. This list numbers 314. Of these 109 are lawyers, 66 gentlemen of leisure, 75 merchants, bankers, and brokers, chiefly importers, 27 litterateurs and publishers, 14 presidents, secretaries, &c., 6 professors, the remaining 17, including 2 foreign consuls, belonging to 9 different professions or businesses.

I do not deny the legal right of these gentlemen to band themselves together for united effort in the expenditure of money for the distribution of free-trade literature or by sending paid counsel to advocate before committees of Congress the principles of free trade or to otherwise attempt to educate and lead the people up to free-trade legislation in their interests. Neither do I envy them the gastronomic and bibulous enjoyments at their meetings, which seems to be one of the leading features of their organization; but we should know who these disinterested philanthropists are and where located.

The percentage of our population who are strictly consumers, not producers, compared with our busy and active population is very small. Most of us have the work of our hands and heads to dispose of. The number of those who have lifted themselves above the active duties of life is too small to shape our industrial policy.

IMPORTANCE OF THE TARIFF TO AGRICULTURISTS.

To the agricultural interest of the country, by far the largest I grant, this question of the tariff is becoming more and more important. The fertile fields of the West, their new and labor-saving machines, and the cheap transportation to the foreign markets have given this branch of our industries special privileges and profits which we can no longer so exclusively enjoy. Our principal competitors in cereal products, British America, India, Australia, and Russia, are fast improving their facilities for competition. England is subsidizing and building railroads in her provinces to afford cheaper transportation; Russia also is improving her means of transportation and building American elevators and labor-saving machines; thus making them stronger competitors in the grain-purchasing sections of the world.

British America has wheat-fields equal in extent to Michigan, Wisconsin, Missouri, Dakota, Montana, New York, and the whole of New England, with a climate not less favorable for wheat-growing than our own.

India is displacing the old rude implements of agriculture with new and modern ones, improving her lands by irrigation, and pushing railroads into the wheat-growing sections of the country. A new railroad line now constructing from Calcutta will open an outlet for from fifty to eighty million bushels per year. Another proposed line would draw traffic from 27,000 square miles of wheat cultivation, or more than 17,000,000 acres, capable of producing 150,000,000 bushels per year, thus increasing rapidly her growth and exports of wheat, as shown by the following figures: Her exports of wheat were, in 1879, 2,000,000 bushels; 1880, 4,000,000 bushels; 1881, 12,000,000 bushels; 1883, 36,000,000 bushels.

United States Consul-General Mattson, of Calcutta, says:

In order to facilitate the development of the wheat resources and to assist the export trade, the Government of India is pursuing a policy of encouragement which has already resulted in better facilities of transit to the seaboard, by the construction of new railways and in the reduction of freight; it has removed taxes, export and octroi duty; it is diffusing knowledge and instruction in the cultivation of wheat and improvement of the soil, constructing canals for irrigation and transportation, and in many other ways giving moral and material aid to this great cause, in the hope that India may ultimately become the granary of Great Britain.

Both India and Russia already show fertility of soil and skill of production nearly equal to our own, their average yield being about 12 bushels per acre, while our average yield in the census year was but 13 bushels per acre.

There are still in India tracts of 20,000 to 60,000 square miles, and in one case of 160,000, containing 20,000,000 people, without a single railroad, and these include some of the most fertile lands of the country.

Statistics from the State Department show that only about one-third of the available wheat lands in India are at present under cultivation, and that large areas of land in Russia, Australia, and Algeria are still uncultivated. The census for 1880 shows, too, that a large part of our own domain is still uncultivated. The possibility of a great increase in agricultural products in this and other countries, and the improved facilities which are now so rapidly being brought into use to cheapen farm products, raises the question whether we have not reached the point of full supply, and presents to us, and especially to our agriculturists, a new and grave problem, Where shall we find a market for our cereal products? Shall we maintain those tariff laws which promote and build up our manufacturing industries, giving employment in the mechanical pursuits and affording a home market for our farm products, or shall we undertake to compete with India and Russia in the wheat-purchasing markets of the world?

The advocates of free trade, recognizing this strong and increasing competition, urge upon the agriculturists to put themselves into a position to meet it by reducing the tariff, stopping the increase of manufactures in this country and reducing the rate of wages. But let us pause and consider how easy a journey this may be and the feast we are invited to.

India's and Russia's railroad facilities are nearly, if not quite, equal to our own—that is, they are able to transport grain from their fields to Liverpool at as low a cost as we can transport it from our fields to Liverpool, and they will soon have the same advantages in labor-saving machinery, so that it brings us directly and singly to the question of the compensation for labor.

The rate of wages has risen very rapidly in India in the last few years. I find that in 1850 unskilled labor commanded about 3 cents per day, and it has now risen 100 per cent., to the enormous sum of 6 cents per day! Farm laborers would command at the present time about 5 or 10 cents per day, and it is with this pauper labor, this semi-barbaric labor that our farm laborers are invited to compete, at least as far as it relates to the exports of wheat and other cereals. Nay, more, at no distant day these grain-growing countries will be knocking at the doors of our great seaport cities of the East with their cereal products. This is a coming event which is casting its shadow before. Then the agricultural sections of the country may not be indifferent as to the rate of duty on farm products, but be ready to vie with the other industries of the country to maintain a protective tariff all along the line for protection's sake. I predict that within five years our farm producers will find necessary and ask for an increase in the duty upon wheat and other cereals. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] stated in his speech that the foreign market fixed the price for our wheat. It is this kind of competition that we should seek to avoid; that is, to measure the compensation for labor in our wheat-fields with that of the ryots of India. The idea advanced by those in favor of free trade, that unless the trade is reciprocal and we purchase the manufactured products of the grain-purchasing countries they will not purchase their food of us, is plausible in argument but has no force in fact. Great Britain, our largest customer, will naturally and most certainly turn to her colonies for her supply. She is not likely to forsake her long-established policy of purchasing in the cheapest and selling in the dearest market. Let us not be misled by this argument.

DIVERSITY OF INTERESTS.

A report by the Agricultural Department gives some striking illustrations of the favorable results to farms located near manufacturing centers, both as relates to the value of the farms per acre and to the net incomes from the same. The tabulation of States to show this is as follows:

Aggregate value of products of agriculture by States, acres of land in farms, and value of farm lands, by States and groups of States.

You will observe that the first group—the largest manufacturing States of the Union—shows the value of the farm lands to be on an average $47.34 per acre; the second group, coming next in order in value of manufactured products, shows the value of the farm lands to be $33.71 per acre; the next group, coming next in order in value of manufactured products, shows the value of the farm lands to be $19.70 per acre, and the last group, having a lesser amount of other industries compared with agriculture, shows the value of farm lands to be only $9.01 per acre.

Comparisons in the same way by the subdivision of the States brings the same results; that is, where the largest percentage of the people are found to be engaged in mechanical pursuits the farm lands are most valuable and yield the largest returns.

I copy some remarks from the report above referred to, they are so pertinent to this subject. It says:

The fact that the group of States where industry is most diversified (those having only 18 per cent. of all workers engaged in agriculture) afford $457 per annum to each one, while the agricultural States, having 77 per cent. in agriculture, allow an annual income of only $160, is too significant to be explained away, too convincing for pretense of cavil. It stands as proof of the necessity of symmetry and completeness of the productive system, and as a forceful illustration of the solidarity of the industries.

Full acceptance of the truth that increase of non-agricultural workers enhances values in agriculture, as proven by this grouping of facts, has been nearly universal.

Therefore, from any standpoint, to establish and maintain new industries in this country brings like advantages and wealth to the farmer and to those engaged directly in them.

Our natural growth in population, together with the large immigration constantly going on, makes an ever-expanding demand for all kinds of American products. There is, too, an increasing per capita consumption as we grow in wealth. The very rich, the well-to-do, the well-paid mechanic and the well-paid common laborer are larger consumers, as they surround their homes with the greater and more numerous comforts of life.

MAGNITUDE OF IMPORTATIONS.

We are a good and living example of reciprocity at home; nine-tenths of our agricultural products find a market here and 98 per cent. of all our other products. The total value of articles manufactured in the United States is given in the census at $5,369,579,191; our total export of these goods for the last fiscal year was $111,890,001. The value of all domestic exports was $804,223,632 at point of shipment.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts tell us what effect a protective duty on wheat would have upon our large outgoing supply?

Mr. RUSSELL. It would certainly not prevent the outflow if there was a foreign demand and we could compete with foreign prices. The United States has for many years had the foreign market substantially at its command. Its control is fast slipping away, not from any policy of ours or inability to supply, but from the severer and increasing outside competition. A protective tariff is maintained by these two great industrial interests, farming and manufacturing. They have a close relation to each other. The protective tariff builds up manufacturing and gives employment to a large number of people engaged in industrial pursuits who consume our farm products. Only about 10 per cent. of these is now exported, estimating the value at point of production.

Mr. MORRISON. That is more than double what the manufacturing people use.

Mr. RUSSELL. That can not be so. If 10 per cent. is exported, 90 per cent. is consumed at home. As the number of those engaged in other industries compared with those engaged in agriculture is as one to two—that is, there are two persons engaged in farming to one in other industries—this latter class must constitute one-third of the home consumers, and therefore consume three-tenths of the total agricultural production.

We are now importing annually $250,000,000 of manufactured products. If these were manufactured in this country it would give direct employment to 700,000 operatives or mechanics and indirect employment and support to 3,500,000 persons. This in itself would give a home market for about one-third of our total exports of agricultural products. These elements should be watched, nourished, and cared for rather than that we should be diverted by the free-trade cry of a limited home market or deluded by the charms of an unlimited foreign market. Our home market will be steady and reliable while our people are clothed and fed with our own products. For an enlarged market let us encourage the consumer to come here, where he will be no less a consumer and our customer, but the rewards of his labor, too, will be a source of wealth to the country.

It will be well to note here that, notwithstanding the charge that we can not increase our exports of merchandise while living under a protective tariff, the percentage of our exports of manufactures, though small, is increasing.

Mr. Nimmo, chief of the Bureau of Statistics, says on this point:

The value of the exports of products of manufacture from the United States during the last fiscal year amounted to $111,890,001, as against $103,132,481 during the preceding year, and was larger than during any previous year in the history of the country. The value of the exports of products of manufacture amounted to only $45,658,873 during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1860. This indicates the growth of the exportation of manufactured articles.

INFANT INDUSTRIES.

A tariff supported by some for the purpose of establishing an industry in this country is well enough as far as it goes. The same necessity exists to-day for the maintenance of a protective tariff that existed when it was first established. It is only a question of degree. The attempts of the free-traders to bring reproach upon the tariff system by the "infant-industry" cry must not blind us to the fact that though the newer may need greater protection than the older and more firmly established, yet few industries will ever become old enough in this country to be able, without protection, to pay American wages for labor and successfully compete with the foreign manufacturer with foreign rates for labor. There should be no ambiguity upon this or any other branch of this subject. Protective tariffs are levied to counterbalance the greater wages paid for the different kinds of service in this country—nothing else. Strip it of everything else, it must stand or fall on that.

THE MORRISON BILL.

If this Congress had begun in good faith to revise the tariff—that is, to improve its administrative features, give protection to some industries overlooked or not properly cared for in the last revision, and perhaps add some articles of raw material to the free-list—there would have been some reason in reopening this question at this time. So far the Committee on Ways and Means, who have had the tariff bill under consideration, have made no effort to improve the present law; but the bill introduced into this House by Mr. MORRISON has come back to the House without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t," except as the friends of the bill have abandoned many of the articles which they at first proposed to put on the free-list.

The provision of the bill that rates shall not be above a given figure or below the rates of the Morrill bill of March 2, 1861, will make a law difficult, if not impossible, to execute, and it will cripple and destroy many industries. Its provisions will fall unequally upon many classes of goods, and especially upon the manufactures of wool. The cut of 20 per cent., so far as it relates to the raw material, or wool under 30 cents per pound, will be estopped by the provisions of the Morrill bill, and only a reduction of 10 per cent. will prevail, as the present duty upon wools of the first class, clothing wools, and of the second class, combing wools, valued at 30 cents per pound and under, is 10 cents per pound, and the rate will be fixed at 9 cents per pound, while the reduction of 20 per cent. will wholly prevail on the goods manufactured from such wools.

WOOL.

It may be claimed by some that this will no more than equalize the rates made on wool and manufactures of wool in the last revision.

To show that no inequality exists I annex as an appendix the actual rates that existed prior to the passage of the act of March 3, 1883, and also the present rates on both wool and woolens. Gentlemen can judge for themselves.

The reduction made in the tariff on wool in the last revision followed the suggestions of the Tariff Commission, and was an equitable and fair adjustment of the duty on wool and woolens. No opposition to these reductions was made before the Ways and Means Committee while they had the bill under consideration by those engaged in sheep husbandry or any one. We did not reach the wool and woolen schedule in the consideration of the bill in the House, so no opposition appeared there. It was not until the bill was considered in the committee of conference that any attempt was made to prevent a reduction of the wool duties, then too late to effect such readjustment of the schedule in the House as would have been essential to the protection of the best interests of the wool-growers as well as the woolen manufacturers.

Although it is unfortunate that the wool-growers press a reconsideration of their interest at this time, before a Congress inimical to protective tariff legislation, which endangers the whole system, I am bound as far as I am concerned to concede to this large body of our citizens engaged in sheep husbandry the same honesty of purpose and the same degree of intelligence in presenting this question that we accord to the manufacturers, upon whose statements we must in part rely to govern our action on this important matter.

WOOLENS.

I also append a schedule of tariff rates on manufactures of wool before and after the last revision. It will be observed at a glance that large reductions have been made in the woolen schedule, varying from 3½ per cent. to 40 per cent., and a reduction on every item except the women's and children's dress-goods made wholly of wool. The greater reductions have been made on the lower and middle grades of goods, used by the masses, and the lesser on the very highest. From a change in style or fashion all-wool dress-goods are taking the place of mixed goods. This class of goods was not made in this country when the old tariff law was passed, and under it an insufficient protection was afforded to insure their manufacture here, and they were almost entirely imported, chiefly from France, Germany, and Belgium, and a few from Bradford, England. A new classification was therefore made to meet this emergency, and the rate increased. It is for this reason that the duties received upon all-wool goods since the revision of the tariff show so little diminution or change in the revenue—from the fact that nearly one-half the importations have been of this grade of goods paying a higher rate of duty than under the old law. Any one who examines carefully the changes made in the wool and woolen schedule will see the necessity, if the duty is increased upon the raw material, of a like increase upon its product to insure the manufacture here and maintain a home demand for domestic wool.

It will be observed that there is a compound duty on woolen goods. The duty per pound is to compensate for the duty on wools, it requiring three or four pounds of wool to make one of cloth, and the ad valorem duty is to counterbalance the duties on chemicals, dyestuffs, and extra cost for labor, taxes, &c.

AD VALOREM RATES.

Merchandise of all kinds the world over has declined in price from overproduction. The merchandise imported in the six months ending December 31, 1883, as referred to in the majority report on the Morrison bill, has come in at lower rates of foreign cost than under the old law, which has changed the equivalent ad valorem as it appears in that report, for as the price of goods imported under specific rates goes down the equivalent ad valorem rate goes up, and unless this fact is considered you will be misled by these printed statements that are given out without explanation. This is fairly illustrated in the article of sugar. While the reductions made in the sugar schedule amounted to fully 21 per cent. from old tariff rates and values of sugar imported prior to July 1, 1883, the statement in the report shows an equivalent reduction of only 2.74 per cent. This is also accounted for by the fact that sugar has fallen in price, and the duty being specific, the equivalent ad valorem rate has advanced.

The system of applying the polariscope test, as provided under the existing law, to ascertain the saccharine strength and value of the sugar, has checked frauds and added to the revenue from this article to an extent not anticipated.

I insert a table prepared by Mr. William Whitman, showing the wages paid in the woolen and worsted mills of Belgium, where these goods are largely made, and in similar mills in this country, the figures being taken directly from the books of the concerns:

Here we find in one country 295 persons earning, on an average, per week $3.68, or 61⅓ cents per day; on the American basis the weekly average would have been $9.95, or $1.65⅔ per day. Mr. Whitman, however, says that an American mill will not be equipped in just the same way as to hands, and this will reduce the cost of labor to a daily average of at least $1.25 per day, against 61 cents in Belgium, or 100 per cent. higher.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD], in his eloquent remarks in the House the other day on the wool question, said to the House and to the country that he opposed the re-establishment of the old rate of duty for the reason that it would advance the price of wool, which would be a burden and misfortune to the woolen manufacturers and in turn make additional cost to the consumer of woolen goods, a burden those people thrown out of employment by the present condition of trade could ill afford to bear. "A condition of trade," he could have fitly added, "brought about by myself and my coagitators creating an alarm throughout the country as to what this Congress might do by tariff legislation." He says the advance of the duty on wool would increase its value here—that he deplores; but in this same speech he goes on to show how lower duties on wool would advance the price here.

He says:

I oppose this motion—

The motion of Mr. CONVERSE to restore the duty on wool—because it proposes to restore the duty on wool and thereby increase the price of that commodity.

Again he says:

I believe if wool were put on the free-list to-day, with a corresponding reduction of the tariff on woolen goods, the result would be a large increase in manufacturing, a large addition to the number of operatives employed, an increase of at least 10 per cent. in the price of wool on the farm, and a reduction of 25 per cent. in price to the people who have to purchase woolen clothes.

To reconcile these two illogical and conflicting positions he argues that lessening the cost of foreign wool by reducing the duty would increase the consumption of domestic wool, enhance its value, and afford cheaper clothing for the people, dearer raw material, cheaper manufactured goods? Let us work out his problem.

It is estimated that the wool clip of this year will amount to 300,000,000 pounds and be worth $85,000,000. The importations of wool for the last fiscal year, of the first and second classes, clothing and combing wools, corresponding with our product was 12,919,642 pounds, valued at $2,911,430.60, which is about 3½ per cent. of our consumption, 96½ per cent. being domestic. By taking off the duty on foreign wool, $2,911,430.60 the gentleman from Ohio promises to increase the value of the home clip 10 per cent., or $8,500,000. Deduct from this sum the duty paid on the foreign wools of these classes, and we have as a net result added $5,588,569.40 to the woolen manufacturer's raw material, and in turn added that much to the cost of wool products, for, as he says, "you can not add to the price of the raw material of which the article is made without increasing the price of the article itself."

The problem to make cheaper clothing out of higher-cost raw material can only be solved by the theorist, the gentleman from Ohio. This proposition will not commend itself to or catch the vote of the consumers any more than it will convince the wool-growers that lowering the duty on wool will increase the price of the domestic clip. If those who are engaged in sheep husbandry want to try the experiment of putting wool on the free-list, I could guarantee there will be no opposition on the part of the manufacturers, for the protection granted to wool in 1867 has always received the cordial support of the woolen manufacturers.

COTTON MILLS IN THE SOUTH.

A letter under date of March 13, 1884, from W. H. Young, president of the Eagle and Phenix Manufacturing Company, at Columbus, Ga., addressed to Hon. HUGH BUCHANAN, and which has gone the rounds of the free-trade press, argues in favor of the reduction proposed by the Morrison bill, and even of free trade, but as "one swallow does not make a summer" so these two or three men who have so far appeared from the South advocating free trade do not represent the true sentiment of the manufacturers of that section.

A printed circular was sent out by Mr. S. D. Phelps, of New York, to the cotton-mills of the South propounding four questions:

1. When was your mill erected?
2. What is its present capacity in spindles and looms?
3. If erected prior to 1860, have you since then increased your capacity, and if so, how much?
4. I should be glad if you would state whether you are in favor of or opposed to a reduction of the present rates of duty on the cotton goods which you manufacture

To these circulars there have come sixty responses. One was in favor of free trade, five expressed an indifference on the subject, eight made no answer to the fourth question, and forty-six were opposed to any change in the tariff. They were distributed in the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama, and the expressions for the retention of the present rates were clear and forcible.

The testimony of Mr. J. F. Hanson, of Macon, Ga. (recently elected president of the Southern and Western Manufacturers' Association), before the Ways and Means Committee, and his letter in reply to that of Mr. Young, read in the Senate and published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 5, present powerful arguments in favor of a protective tariff.

As to the increase of cotton manufacturing in the South, I offer a statement from the Baltimore Manufacturers' Record of recent date:

COTTON MANUFACTURES IN THE SOUTH—PROGRESS SINCE 1880.

The South and its rapid development are everywhere spoken of. The papers, North, South, East, and West, as well as European, are almost daily telling of the unexampled progress of that fair land which stretches from the southern border of Pennsylvania down to Mexico. And thus the world knows that a new South has arisen from the ashes of the old, and that the slow and easy methods of former times has given place to a spirit of enterprise and push that would do credit to the great West with its stirring life and activity. But while the world knows of these things, it is only in a general way. Every one knows, for example, that the cotton manufacturing interests of the South have wonderfully increased of late years; but few know just how great has been that increase. Hence, with a view of showing just what has been accomplished in this one line—cotton manufacturing—we have compiled a full list of all the cotton-mills in the South, with the number of spindles and looms in each; and by comparing the figures thus obtained with the report of the United States census covering the year from June 1, 1879, to May 31, 1880, we can readily see how great has been the advance made. The summing up of these figures, which are presented in full detail further on, gives the following remarkably interesting table:

Number of cotton spindles and looms in the South on January 1, 1884, as compiled by the Baltimore Manufacturers' Record, compared with the number on May 31, 1880, as given in the United States census reports.

| States. | January 1, 1884. | | June 1, 1880. | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| | No. of spindles. | No. of looms. | No. of spindles. | No. of looms. |
| Alabama | 82,057 | 1,614 | 55,072 | 1,060 |
| Arkansas | 6,300 | 39 | 2,015 | 28 |
| Florida | 1,918 | ..... | 816 | ..... |
| Georgia | 340,130 | 7,843 | 200,974 | 4,718 |
| Kentucky | 26,264 | 471 | 9,022 | 73 |
| Louisiana | 39,669 | 824 | 6,097 | 120 |
| Maryland | 169,300 | 2,581 | 125,014 | 2,325 |
| Mississippi | 49,128 | 1,120 | 26,172 | 704 |
| North Carolina | 213,672 | 3,543 | 102,767 | 1,960 |
| South Carolina | 191,048 | 3,389 | 92,788 | 1,776 |
| Tennessee | 78,887 | 1,461 | 46,268 | 1,068 |
| Texas | 12,274 | 165 | 2,648 | 71 |
| Virginia | 66,096 | 1,832 | 44,336 | 1,324 |
| Total | 1,276,422 | 24,873 | 713,989 | 15,222 |

The foregoing figures show that at the present time there are 1,276,422 spindles and 24,873 looms in the Southern cotton-mills, as against 713,984 spindles and 15,222 looms on May 1, 1880, or an increase of 562,433 spindles and 9,651 looms in just three years and a half, or an increase in that time of about 80 per cent. in spindles and 60 per cent. in the number of looms. It must be remembered that these figures do not represent the entire number of new spindles and looms placed in Southern mills since 1880, but only the increase in the present aggregate number as compared with the total on May 1, 1880; for thousands of old spindles have been taken out during the past three years and been replaced by new ones: so that could we obtain the exact number of new spindles and looms purchased by Southern mills since the census report was gathered, it would probably be not less than 800,000 of the former and 5,000 of the latter. According to the census, the value of the products of all Southern cotton mills for the year ended May 31, 1880, was a little over $21,000,000, and while the exact figures for the past year are not obtainable, yet it is believed that the value for 1883 was between $35,000,000 and $40,000,000.

The gentleman from Texas says the tariff does not regulate the rate of wages, and cites in proof one fact—that the laborers at Columbus and Atlanta do not receive as much wages, while performing the same class of work, as those in Lowell. He is in one sense correct. That is, they do not receive in the Southern mills so much per capita as they do in Lowell for the reason that they are not as skilful and do not earn as much money per day, though it cost the Southern manufacturer as much per yard to weave his cloth as it does in the East. Mr. Hanson, of Macon, Ga., in his testimony on this point, in answer to a question, said:

The question with him was at what rate per pound he could produce his goods. He had no statistics with him, but he was of the impression (and he would venture upon stating it as his opinion here) that, comparing the cotton mills of Lowell, Mass., and the cotton mills of Augusta, Ga., (which were regarded as the best mills in the South), number for number and pound for pound, labor was as cheap in Lowell as it was in Augusta, though the labor in Augusta might appear to be cheaper per capita. The hands in the Lowell mills might earn better wages than those in the Augusta mills, but when the pay-roll came to be divided up at the end by production, he doubted very seriously whether Augusta could show as good results as Lowell could.

The question is asked, how shall we reduce the revenue? Certainly not by lowering the barrier now maintained. If a reduction of 20 per cent. is made, as proposed, greater quantities of goods will come in and larger revenues will flow into the Treasury. To lower the rates at this time, when the foreign markets are glutted, would certainly not open any new market for our own surplus, but destroy what we have. If the present rates are maintained, it is hoped we shall rapidly reduce the importation of manufactured goods. There was imported in the last fiscal year, under the cotton, woolen, and iron and steel schedules goods to the value of $111,000,000, bringing into the Treasury from duties $58,000,000, as per the accompanying table:

| Schedule. | Value. | Duty. |
|---|---|---|
| Cotton | $32,359,343 70 | $12,238,500 38 |
| Wool | 42,552,455 99 | 29,166,370 09 |
| Iron and steel | 40,837,376 19 | 16,599,460 93 |
| Totals | 115,749,175 88 | 58,004,331 40 |

This importation should be and will be largely reduced under the present rate of duty if the tariff agitation would cease and a stable policy assured to capital and skill and the revenue thereby lessened.

INFLUENCE OF POLITICS.

The last Congress was embarrassed and hampered, as this one is, by a misunderstanding and want of a well defined policy in both parties as to the relation the revenue features of the tariff bear to the needs of the Government and the true relation the protective features of the tariff bear to the industries of the country. Hence we are troubled with too much revenue. Another Congress, I predict, will be so fully master of the situation that both the tariff and revenue laws can be taken up and readjusted with that intelligent and careful consideration of the subject, as it relates both to the needs of the Government and protection to our industries, that a Congress crazed with the Presidential fever can not give, and a sufficient time will have expired to obtain intelligent results from the last revision.

The fact is we do not fully realize the possibilities of this country. The variety of temperature and soil, the forests, navigable waters, and water-powers make us more independent than any other nation. The God of nature and the hand of destiny mark and direct our pathway.

Finally, in view of the facts that this country is the most prosperous financially and socially of any in the world, that all professions—the skilled artisans and the common laborers—are better rewarded for labor than in any other country, that we offer to the tillers of the soil a market for nine-tenths of their products and at better prices than are obtained by any other people, that the establishment of manufacturing enterprises, made possible by protection, in the various sections of the country is adding new value to the farm lands, and the establishment of these industries is creating a fresh competition and reducing every variety of manufacture to the lowest possible cost, I hope this House will pause in its rash and inconsiderate movement to disturb the industrial interests of the country for political purposes.

If you think the political cyclone which swept the country two years ago and wiped out the Republican majority in this House was an expression of the people on this question of protective tariff, I warn you of your mistake and predict that if you allow this idea to shape your policy and action on this bill you will be overtaken by a cyclone no less violent but broader in its scope than that of 1882, and of your party it will be said that "the wind passeth over it and it is gone; and the place thereof shall know it no more."

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, the wonderful progress of this country in its material wealth, its varied industries, and its population, when compared with other nations, is as captivating to the imagination and pride of her citizens as the airy structures of futurity to the budding fancies of ambitious youth. Her decades equal centuries when compared to other people. Her vast untilled and unpeopled tracts of virgin soil, her inventive genius, her products of field, forest, mine, and factory, and her political institutions, beckoning to her shores the capital, skill, and labor of the best races of the world, stimulate conceits of future glory beyond all capacity of human reckoning. Her isolated condition exempts her from the rivalries, jealousies, hatreds, standing armies, burdensome taxes, and desolating wars which curse European nationalities. Her people can pursue the thousand ways to individual advancement assured that life, liberty, and property are guarded by free institutions of their own making and directed by their own will.

Whatever of bloody internal strife the record of our past may disclose, such is the prospect our present condition paints to our hopes. Freed from foreign foes, we have nothing to fear save those internal convulsions which may afflict society under any form of national organization which may be adopted. Fortunately for us our Constitution and our laws have been distinguished as compromises of conflicting opinions, and when left to peaceful solution all our differences will be controlled sooner or later by the genius which inspired them. Ten years ago the heavy hand of misfortune was laid upon all the avocations of life, while an enormous national debt startled us into fear that even the taxes needed to carry on a gigantic civil war could not in a generation furnish much relief from the burden it imposed. Now we are told by some the debt is being paid too rapidly, and the surplus revenues, notwithstanding the reductions of taxation heretofore made, are forcing us to the further consideration of how we shall graduate them to public necessities.

The Secretary of the Treasury in his estimate of receipts for 1885 places them at $343,000,000 and the expenditures for the same period at $283,125,304.93, including the sinking fund, or an estimated surplus of $59,874,695.05. Excluding the sinking fund, the estimated expenditures will be $236,855,548, showing an expected surplus of $106,144,452. Assuming that Congress will continue to comply with the law in relation to the sinking fund, we will still be collecting from taxation $59,874,695.05 more than it is estimated we need for the Government. The expenditures ought to be at least $10,000,000 less than is asked for by the several governmental departments. The estimate for the cost of the military and naval establishments both is less than $50,000,000. The pension-list is estimated at $40,000,000. The opportunity is presented of taking off a sum equal to the cost of the military and naval establishments combined and ten millions still to spare, or a sum equal to the pension-list and $20,000,000 to spare. The revenues of this fiscal year are thus estimated on the basis of existing laws by the Secretary of the Treasury:

|---|---|
| From customs | $195,000,000 |
| From internal revenue | 120,000,000 |
| From sales of public lands | 8,000,000 |
| From tax on circulation of national banks | 3,000,000 |
| From repayment of interest and sinking fund, Pacific railway companies | $2,000,000 |
| From customs fees, fines, penalties, &c | 1,200,000 |
| From fees—consular, letters patent, and lands | 3,300,000 |
| From proceeds of sales of Government property | 300,000 |
| From profits on coinage, &c | 4,000,000 |
| From deposits for surveying public lands | 500,000 |
| From revenues of the District of Columbia | 1,900,000 |
| From miscellaneous sources | 3,800,000 |
| Total estimated ordinary receipts | 343,000,000 |

It thus appears that from customs we will get $195,000,000; from internal revenue, $120,000,000; from both, $315,000,000; and from all other sources, $28,000,000. The foregoing statement shows that reductions must be made from the two first-named items. The pending bill brings us to the consideration of reduction of duties on customs. The powers of taxation are defined in the Constitution. When they shall be exercised and how are questions of policy and justice to all tax-payers limited by the terms of that instrument. Article 1, section 8, is in this language:

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States; &c.

It has been said by many eminent men that under the phrase "general welfare" Congress may fix duties on foreign articles of merchandise to prevent competition with our own manufactured products. In other words, that the power of taxation, which the American Colonies intrusted with so much jealousy to the Federal Government, is thus easily transformed into one of regulating commerce; and this, too, when the very same section in another paragraph delegates the power to regulate commerce specifically. In the works of Hamilton, volume 3, from page 244 to 251, in a communication as Secretary of the Treasury to the House of Representatives, dated December 5, 1791, we find him arguing that we may not only establish protecting duties but prohibit the sale of rival articles by duties equivalent to prohibition. And for the authority to do these things he refers us to the said section, and says:

> The terms general welfare were doubtless intended to signify more than was expressed or imported in those which preceded; otherwise numerous exigencies incident to the affairs of a nation would have been left without a provision. The phrase is as comprehensive as any that could have been used; because it was not fit that the constitutional authority of the Union to appropriate its revenues should have been restricted within narrower limits than the "general welfare;" and because this embraces a vast variety of particulars, which are susceptible neither of specification nor of definition.

To this construction no one can make objection. Thence he says:

> It is, therefore, of necessity left to the discretion of the National Legislature to pronounce upon the objects which concern the general welfare and for which, under that description, an appropriation of money is requisite and proper.

A prohibition of a rival article, thereby preventing any revenue from it, can not be called an appropriation of money to any object, as it can not from its terms yield any. Such reasoning from one who failed to impress his own views in our fundamental laws and who regarded them as inadequate in strength suggests that he hoped by construction to give to the Federal Government that power which the States and the people would not yield to it. It is not strange that, imbued with the same feeling, we should find him in the same document declaring for the power to prohibit the exportation of the materials of manufactures, notwithstanding clause 5, section 9 of article 1, declares no export duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State. Nor is it strange that men began to divide on the power claimed for the Federal Government by construction in the first administration, and that the contest sharpened until the popular purpose accomplished the election of Mr. Jefferson. Notwithstanding Mr. Hamilton's theories, the system of connecting protection of home industries with indirect taxation received but little development until the last war with Great Britain, when the consequent public indebtedness furnished an occasion and an excuse for it in the taxing power to pay the public debt.

I have referred to the views of Mr. Hamilton as the best illustration of those of the genuine protectionist on the question of constitutional power. The amount of revenue necessary to meet the expenditures of the Government must, under the Constitution, be met by taxation. This may clearly be done by a tariff framed for this purpose. With this purpose the objects of taxation may be so selected as to protect and foster home industries, not by prohibiting foreign trade, but by home competition with it. The duty may be too low to yield revenue and too high to yield it. Between these extremes the constitutional revenue standard is to be found. In this connection I beg leave to quote from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of December 3, 1845—Mr. R. J. Walker's:

> The whole power to collect taxes, whether direct or indirect, is conferred by the same clause of the Constitution. The words are, "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises." A direct tax or excise, not for revenue but for protection, clearly would not be within the legitimate object of taxation; and yet it would be as much so as a duty imposed for a similar purpose. The power is to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises. A duty must be laid only that it may be collected; and if it is so imposed that it can not be collected, in whole or in part, it violates the declared object of the granted power.

Again, he says:

> The Constitution declares that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives. A tariff, it is conceded, can only originate in the House, because it is a bill for raising revenue. That is the only proper object of such a bill. A tariff is a bill to "lay and collect taxes." It is a bill for "raising revenue;" and whenever it departs from that object, in whole or in part, either by total or partial prohibition, it violates the purpose of the granted power.

These views of the Constitution rest upon the true construction of its language and intent, fidelity to the people who consented to it through their representatives, and such faith in its adaptation to the public good as destroys the temptation to alter it by ingenious construction. Almost from the beginning of this Government under the present Constitution until this hour the conflicting views just outlined are seen dividing public men and parties. Law books, reports of Congressional debates, magazines, and newspapers show the irrepressibility of the contest. It will find no end so long as man can gain advantage over his fellow by the use of unjust laws. His avarice is apt to outspeed his sense of justice or his patriotism.

The object of the manufacturer in seeking high duties on foreign goods is to enable him to raise the price of his own to the consumer. And generally this increase of price is equal to that of the foreign goods and the duty added, and is paid by the consumer. Of course this is bitterly denied by the manufacturers. Before engaging in controversy with them let us take the views of distinguished statesmen of their own school. Mr. Adams, on May 23, 1832, in a report from the Committee on Manufactures, uses this language:

> But the duty upon the article imported from abroad enables the domestic producer to enter into competition with the importer from abroad. So long as this competition continues the duty operates as a premium or bounty to the domestic manufacturer. But by whom is it paid? Certainly by the purchaser of the article, whether of foreign or domestic manufacture. The duty constitutes a part of the price of the whole mass of the article in the market.

Again, he says:

> The incidental effect of competition in the market, excited on the part of the domestic manufacturer by the aggravation of duty upon the corresponding article imported from abroad, to reduce the price of the article must be transient and momentary. The general and permanent effect must be to increase the price to the extent of the additional duty, and it is then paid by the consumer.

Mr. Hamilton, in his report, before referred to, speaking of protective duties, says:

> Duties of this nature evidently amount to a virtual bounty on the domestic fabrics, since by enhancing the charges on the foreign articles they enable the national manufacturers to undersell all their foreign competitors.

Mr. Chairman, I will now quote from a distinguished Georgian. Mr. Cobb, in his report as Secretary of the Treasury in 1857, when the domestic manufacturers were demanding an increase of customs duties, used this language:

> The theory of the protectionists is this: That under a low tariff the importations of foreign manufacturers is encouraged, and being brought into the country at lower prices than they can be produced, the competition with the domestic manufacturer is ruinous to his business. The remedy is to raise the duties upon the foreign article to such a point that either it will be excluded, and thus give to the domestic manufacturer the entire home market, or else it will be so increased in price by the additional duty as to enable the domestic manufacturer to receive a remunerating price for his productions.
> If the increased duty neither diminishes the importations nor increases the price, it is manifest that no advantage has been derived by the domestic manufacturer. If the effect should be to exclude the foreign article, then the domestic manufacturer monopolizes the home market and commands his own price. The effect upon the consumer is clear. He must pay the increased price thus put upon the article of consumption. Nor does it stop there. Under the existing state of things, when he has purchased the article he has not only furnished himself with the goods he needed at the reduced price, but at the same time has paid into the Treasury the tax required of him for the support of the Government. The measure of relief proposed by the protectionists increases the price he is required to pay for his goods, and when the foreign article is excluded leaves his tax unpaid. If, however, the increased duty should not exclude the importation of the article, but simply advance the price to a remunerating rate to the domestic manufacturer, the effect upon the consumer would be to require him to pay the additional price, not only upon the foreign article but also on the domestic manufacture. In no event can the increased duty operate to the advantage and relief of the manufacturer except by a corresponding injury to the consumer.

I have quoted from official papers liberally because the eminent positions of the authors and the large share of confidence they enjoyed, together with the fact that they are removed from the active and fervid struggles of the hour, are more likely to command a respectful hearing than any utterance coming from any man living. Now let us examine for a moment what this duty on foreign goods is. The total value of woolen goods imported in 1882 was $47,618,182. The duty collected on the same was $29,253,016, and the per cent. of duty 61.43. It is needless for me to add that this touches all woolen goods used for clothing or for any other purpose by the people of this country.

In 1880 the domestic woolen manufactures amounted to $267,252,913. Assuming the imports of these articles in 1882 to be the same as in 1880, the consumption of the domestic article exceeds the foreign nearly six-fold. Multiply the duties on the foreign articles by 5½, and you have $260,892,000 as the sum which would have gone into the Treasury had the domestic goods paid the same tax as the foreign—a sum nearly equal to the total value of the American product.

The last census shows hosiery and knit goods to be valued at $29,167,227, and manufactured in seven States, to wit, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island. Felt goods are valued at $3,619,652, and manufactured in seven States, to wit, Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania. Carpets, other than rag, are valued at $31,792,802, and made in seven States—Connecticut, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York, and Pennsylvania. Worsted goods are valued at $33,549,942, and manufactured in eight States, to wit, Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island.

The total value of woolen goods is $160,606,721. Of this sum—

|---|---|
| Connecticut has | $16,892,284 |
| Massachusetts | 45,099,203 |
| New Hampshire | 8,113,839 |
| New Jersey | 4,984,007 |
| New York | 9,871,973 |
| Ohio | 1,678,189 |
| Pennsylvania | 32,980,786 |
| Rhode Island | 15,410,450 |
| Total | 135,080,931 |

In my own State, Georgia, it is $239,390; and her total manufacture of wool in every form is only $371,399.

Assuming the increase of price on the American product to be one-half the duty, and it is enhanced to the consumer $140,000,000, nearly all of which is given to the manufacturer in seven or eight States already designated, and is taken from the people of every locality in the American Union. And the articles used by the poor people of the country are uniformly taxed higher than any other. Out of 17,392,099 people engaged in various callings, 2,332,595 are now engaged in manufacturing; and even these must pay the higher rates designated. The number of persons engaged in manufactures of wool is 161,557. Nearly $1,000 to the hand is thus contributed by the country to the woolen manufacturers under the popular cry of protecting American labor. The actual sum paid to the laborers is $47,389,087, about one-third of the sum claimed for them. It is easy in this view to understand how nearly five-sixths of the woolen goods consumed in this country are home manufacture, and foreign competition nearly destroyed. After such an examination how sublime was the audacity which last winter reduced the duty on wool and then increased the duty on the manufactured product. These high duties have created the practice of stopping work when prices are unsatisfactory until any excess of supply over demand is cut off. In the mean time labor is either idle or partially employed. This is what is sometimes enthusiastically designated as preserving the home market for ourselves.

In my criticism on the duties prior to the law of 1883 I do not overlook the fact that under its operation they were changed. The modification has been sometimes to increase and then to slightly decrease them on the several items. They are too slight to avoid the application of what I have said to the present law. I have taken the old law as the basis of my observations, because statistical information under the new law is not yet fully accessible.

Let us look now at the cotton manufactures. The census shows that in the Eastern States, Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut have invested in this industry $156,754,690. The Middle States, composed of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland, have invested $31,014,759. The twelve Southern States have invested $17,375,897. Eight Western States have invested $3,135,000. The total capital invested is $208,280,346. It then appears that this capital is all in the six Eastern States except $51,525,656. Massachusetts owns $72,291,601; this exceeds by $20,770,945, all the capital so invested in all the States of the Union except the six designated as Eastern.

The value of the product in the Eastern States is $143,363,030; in the Middle States is $29,389,286; in the Southern States is $16,356,598; in the Western States is $2,981,196. It thus appears that while the total value of the cotton manufactures in 1880 was $192,090,110, all of this was produced in the six Eastern States except $48,727,072. Massachusetts alone produced $72,280,518 of the gross sum. We imported in 1880 goods valued at $31,285,306. The ad valorem rate of duty was 39.08 per cent. The duty collected was $12,227,103. Now, assuming that the home product was increased in value by the rate of duty and discount its value accordingly, and it would be $117,174,967, instead of $192,090,110, a clear bounty of $74,915,143. Of this last sum $61,711,582 would go to the six Eastern States. Massachusetts alone would get $28,192,913. Had this bounty gone into the Treasury we should have had there, instead of the sum stated, $87,142,246. I do not say the full price is always added to the duty. Overproduction at home will temporarily reduce the price. Then the factories abate their work, discharge their hands, or work on short time until the product equals the demand only, and then the higher rate returns. This is the normal condition.

Let us now briefly look at the manufactures of iron and steel. The total value of these products by the census of 1880 is $296,557,685. Of this Illinois, New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania produce $223,259,136, leaving $73,298,549 to be divided between thirty-four States. Georgia's product is valued at the insignificant sum of $900,850. The total import of these articles is valued at $53,998,266. Of this $24,175,547 is duty. The residue, $29,823,719, represents the value of the product, less than 11 per cent. of the consumption in this country. The average ad valorem duty on iron is 40.38 per cent. and on steel 49.57 per cent. Discount the value of the product 45 per cent. and you give to the manufacturers of iron and steel a bonus of $133,450,958. We will be told the whole duty is not added to the price. This is sometimes true, and sometimes the price is not increased by the full amount of the duty. Nevertheless the increase will average half this sum in times of distress from overproduction, and approach very nearly to it when the demand and supply equal each other. Mr. Adams's view on this subject, heretofore quoted, is very high authority.

I will not fatigue you further by the consideration of other industries. Suffice it to say that almost every article of necessity, convenience, or luxury which the people of this country use is increased in price to them by the tariff. The advocates of protection claim they ought to have the home market. If but few goods are imported because the duty is placed so high as to prevent it, then you get but a small revenue. Then your principal object is not revenue, but to take from the great body of the people to give to large manufacturers, under the plausible pretense of keeping the home market for Americans. The principal plea is that you must do this to elevate American labor above the pauper labor of Europe. This, it is claimed, can not be done except with a high tariff. England is a free-trade country. France and Germany are protective countries. The labor in England is much higher than in the two latter countries; yet England far outstrips them in manufacture. Demand and supply regulates the price of labor everywhere. Hence you find often that when the duty is raised the price of labor goes down. We are told that protection cheapens products. A plate-glass manufacturer, in a hearing before the Ways and Means Committee, illustrated this doctrine in this way. He said ten years ago plate-glass cost $2.50 a square foot. Home competition has brought it down to $1. When asked the price abroad he said he did not know.

The census report shows that in 1880 in Europe the consumer could buy it at 60 cents per square foot. Either this gentleman was very stupid or else he intended to deceive the committee by creating the impression that plate-glass was lower in this country than anywhere else. He thought, however, the reduction of the duty on this article of 20 per cent. would ruin him. Many gentlemen representing various industries were heard. They avowed also that home competition had reduced the price to the consumer instead of raising it. None of them could be induced to give the value of their products in foreign markets, so that a comparison could be made. You can not get that sort of information from your Bureau of Statistics nor your custom-house officials. The veil is purposely kept between you and the truth. It is passing strange that this information, which is so important to an intelligent consideration of the great question of revenue, should be concealed. It is idle to say that it can not be reached. Your customs appraisers must know it to collect duties where so great a part are ad valorem. Nothing but a change of administration will turn the light on this darkness.

These same gentlemen in urging the necessity of letting the tariff alone in the interest of American labor revealed some singular facts. They would commence by saying the labor in this article is, say, 66 per cent.; the value of the materials, 46. When told this could leave them no profit this would be the explanation: The raw material is valued and every other expense is charged to labor. In this is included taxes, insurance, repairs, salaries of high officials, &c. When asked for these salaries they invariably refused to give them. After materials and labor are paid then they said, "We must have a profit on our capital." When asked what their profits were they declined to give them. They wanted protection and yet concealed one of the elements necessary to demonstrate how much was needed. What a sham is thus exposed in this cry for the American laborer. When asked how much duty was necessary for them they would say, "We want to be let alone." This was all Oakes Ames wanted.

A story is told of a criminal who was exported to Australia for crime. In the course of years he bought large tracts of land for an almost nominal price. Later they were discovered to be rich in iron ore, and this made him the wealthiest man in that country. His income was estimated at $500,000 per year. A friend said to him, "You ought to thank the British Government for sending you here, as it has resulted in your being the richest man in Australia." "Ah," said he, "when in England I was a burglar by trade, and I could have made $2,000,000 in a single night. All I wanted was to be let alone."

Mr. Chairman, I am not a free-trader. I believe in getting revenue from importations. I believe, however, that we should not legislate to avoid revenue, to make rich men richer and poor men poorer, under the pretense of elevating the American laborer above the pauper labor of Europe and keeping the home market for ourselves. We ought to so legislate as ultimately to reach a revenue standard. This can not be done at once. So much capital has been invested in the various manufacturing industries that a sudden change of policy would produce great disaster. Our progress should be as slow as true caution requires. Five, ten, or twenty years may be needed to accomplish it. Yet it must be done. The struggle will be fierce and arduous. Manufacturers will sacrifice political alliances, form new ones, and use every device to hold what they have. It is an almost daily observation that if the Democratic party does not abandon the effort to reduce our tariff legislation we can not elect a President. We are told the manufacturers are powerful in their wealth, and this will be used against us and effectually. If politicians on such suggestions abandon the people the time will come when truer representatives will take their places and resume the contest. The people are interested more in just and equal laws than in who shall be President. I fear, sir, that it can be said now, the Presidency is bought and sold every four years. Let us be careful lest the popular mind should be imbued with this truth and come to distrust all authority.

I honor the man who by economy, industry, and enterprise accumulates wealth. He is a public benefactor. He encourages others by his example. Just legislation is his best safeguard. I pray that laws begotten of cupidity may not characterize this country. They can but alienate the people. What social tendency they may beget no man can foretell. We live in an age of wonderful mental activity. The steam-engine, the telegraph, the spirit of invention and inquiry are but so many illustrations of it. Who shall say what of good or evil is near at hand in the political thought of this nation? Who can say that some frenzy such as that of the French revolution may not in the life of men now living repeat its horrors in our fair land? Before its avenging spirit no man nor body of men nor military force can stand in successful defiance. In its overwhelming current it will bear all men, all ideas, all forces to its destination of horror. I have faith, sir, in the people. I believe they are capable of reforming abuses by constitutional methods manifested by fair discussion. The past has demonstrated it and furnishes hope for the years to come. The great civil war alone permitted the present high taxes. The party which holds power hereafter must do it by outstripping its opponent in their reduction. Sophisms and audacious statements may be obstructions in the way, but they will only give volume and power to the current of reform which can not be staid.

Mr. Hamilton, in the report already referred to, commends pecuniary bounties for many reasons, which would require too much time for recital here. This is especially adapted to encourage farm products, he says. It can not therefore be urged, if this distinguished political economist is to be the guide, that the producers of cotton or grain which contribute so much to home manufactures are not entitled to this kind of encouragement. As I represent a cotton-growing constituency, I ask your attention to the beneficial effects such a course would have on that industry. The cotton exports in 1883 are valued at $247,328,271. The American laborer is paid, including rations, 45 cents per day. The Egyptian laborer is paid 7 cents per day, out of which he pays for his own food. One-third of $247,328,271 represents labor and is equal to $82,442,723. Now, to put the American laborer on an equal footing with the pauper labor of Egypt you must give the American producer six times this sum, $494,656,338. Deduct the $82,442,723 from that, and a clear bounty of $412,213,615 would be the bounty less the labor. This would be $164,885,344 more than the value of the exports. The home consumption, which is one-third of the product, has not been considered in this calculation, and if done would increase the bounty in the same proportion. Lands would advance two and three fold in value. Great areas now unoccupied would attract millions of people to the South. The laborer would be elevated in comforts, intelligence, and morals to a higher standard than any in the world. The manufacturer would get his raw material cheaper, and so supply all the cotton fabrics at a cheaper rate to all of our consumers. We should soon destroy the production of cotton in every other country and increase our export item in this article alone to an almost fabulous sum.

The South once had slave labor. This annual bonus would equal more than five times the value of her slave labor. She would grow richer in one decade than she did from her settlement to 1860. She, too, might become haughty and fancy it was due to her superiority over the people of other sections of the Union. In a few years she might claim this bonus a benefit to every other section, and feel enraged whenever her opinion was questioned. She might soon control the Federal Government by the power which wealth brings to a continuance of this policy. She might abandon all devotion to that Constitution which sought to restrain Federal power. Ay, she would hasten, I fear, to accept broader constructions of that instrument than Hamilton in all his love of Federal power ever dreamed of. This same policy extended to the grain-growing regions would have like effect, but I forbear entering further on the subject of bounties to farmers. I know the protected manufacturer is already impatient. I know he is ready to denounce all this as worse than nonsense, and sees in it naught but an attack on his industries. Although it is pregnant with equity and justice, this does not reach his judgment or conscience, but stirs his hatred and scorn. On the contrary, he says of him: "He ought not to be allowed to trade with any one save ourselves. He ought to be compelled by law to buy our products, though he may have to pay twice as much as the Englishman or Frenchman or German would charge him, and though these same people must buy his surplus farm products, or else it is only fit for fuel." This is their idea of equality before the law. This is their idea of republican institutions. This intent, they would have you believe, was present with our fathers when they formed and adopted the present Constitution.

Mr. Chairman, I have often heard protectionists denouncing men who represented agricultural sections and who opposed high tariffs because of the burdens imposed by them on farmers. They have declared them too feeble in intelligence to see beyond their own locality, and too narrow in patriotism to comprehend the varied pursuits of a great people. How misdirected this scorn! Because the farmer sees himself compelled to pay in a thousand forms tribute to men of large capital, invested in manufacturing industries, and is discontented at this quasi-slavery and desires a reformation in legislation which contemplates justice to all men, he is to be called stupid and unpatriotic. This pharisaical cant from selfish men is deserving only of the return of contempt from every one who regards the rights of his neighbor. The manufacturer seems to think the people and the Government were intended only for him. He is ever calling for legislative aid. He has so far succeeded. Agriculture is staggering all over this land from these burdens. Thrust yourself athwart his views and he threatens the use of the elective franchise and of his ill-gotten gains to defeat your party at the ballot-box. He organizes in great associations and boasts that he can make or unmake the political fortunes of public men for the highest offices in the land. He has dictated to Congress and the President already a tariff commission in his own interest. He clings to its iniquitous results with all the fierceness of "the mountain cat who guards her young." His opponents are stupid and narrow-minded or in the pay of England. They are getting British gold.

I have no unkind feeling toward any industry in this land. I would infuse into each of them tenfold more of life if I could by willing it. But, sir, I will not subscribe to a policy which impoverishes the great mass of our people engaged in agriculture to enrich sections engaged principally in making cotton or woolen or iron manufactures, even though, forsooth, some part of them are located in my own State. The health of our Constitution and the permanence of our institutions depend on the dignity and prosperity of our rural population. Give to them an equal chance to prosper by equal laws. Let that prosperity hold our young men to the farms. Stay in this way their drift to city life. Thus you will do more than in any other to make our nation sober, thoughtful, conservative, and happy. Our great cities have been aptly termed sores on the body politic. They are the hot-beds of vice, crime, and revolution. While commerce and manufactures necessarily create them, the evil they contain may be subjected to control always if the pure blood of healthy country life is rightly guarded by lofty statesmanship.

Mr. Chairman, the pending bill is liable to several criticisms. It is alleged that it fails to correct inequalities in the present law. I answer, the committee did not undertake to do this. It was thought best to

Mr. Chairman, I will now quote from a distinguished Georgian. Mr. Cobb, in his report as Secretary of the Treasury in 1857, when the domestic manufacturers were demanding an increase of customs duties, used this language:

The theory of the protectionists is this: That under a low tariff the importations of foreign manufacturers is encouraged, and being brought into the country at lower prices than they can be produced, the competition with the domestic manufacturer is ruinous to his business. The remedy is to raise the duties upon the foreign article to such a point that either it will be excluded, and thus give to the domestic manufacturer the entire home market, or else it will be so increased in price by the additional duty as to enable the domestic manufacturer to receive a remunerating price for his productions.

If the increased duty neither diminishes the importations nor increases the price, it is manifest that no advantage has been derived by the domestic manufacturer. If the effect should be to exclude the foreign article, then the domestic manufacturer monopolizes the home market and commands his own price. The effect upon the consumer is clear. He must pay the increased price thus put upon the article of consumption. Nor does it stop there. Under the existing state of things, when he has purchased the article he has not only furnished himself with the goods he needed at the reduced price, but at the same time has paid into the Treasury the tax required of him for the support of the Government. The measure of relief proposed by the protectionists increases the price he is required to pay for his goods, and when the foreign article is excluded leaves his tax unpaid. If, however, the increased duty should not exclude the importation of the article, but simply advance the price to a remunerating rate to the domestic manufacturer, the effect upon the consumer would be to require him to pay the additional price, not only upon the foreign article but also on the domestic manufacture. In no event can the increased duty operate to the advantage and relief of the manufacturer except by a corresponding injury to the consumer.

I have quoted from official papers liberally because the eminent positions of the authors and the large share of confidence they enjoyed, together with the fact that they are removed from the active and fervid struggles of the hour, are more likely to command a respectful hearing than any utterance coming from any man living. Now let us examine for a moment what this duty on foreign goods is. The total value of woolen goods imported in 1882 was $47,618,182. The duty collected on the same was $29,253,016, and the per cent. of duty 61.43. It is needless for me to add that this touches all woolen goods used for clothing or for any other purpose by the people of this country.

In 1880 the domestic woolen manufactures amounted to $267,252,913. Assuming the imports of these articles in 1882 to be the same as in 1880, the consumption of the domestic article exceeds the foreign nearly sixfold. Multiply the duties on the foreign articles by 5½, and you have $260,892,000 as the sum which would have gone into the Treasury had the domestic goods paid the same tax as the foreign—a sum nearly equal to the total value of the American product.

The last census shows hosiery and knit goods to be valued at $29,167,227, and manufactured in seven States, to wit, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island. In my own State, Georgia, it is $239,390; and her total manufacture of wool in every form is only $371,399.

Assuming the increase of price on the American product to be one-half the duty, and it is enhanced to the consumer $140,000,000, nearly all of which is given to the manufacturer in seven or eight States already designated, and is taken from the people of every locality in the American Union. And the articles used by the poor people of the country are uniformly taxed higher than any other. Out of 17,392,099 people engaged in various callings, 2,332,595 are now engaged in manufacturing; and even these must pay the higher rates designated. The number of persons engaged in manufactures of wool is 161,557. Nearly $1,000 to the hand is thus contributed by the country to the woolen manufacturers under the popular cry of protecting American labor. The actual sum paid to the laborers is $47,389,087, about one-third of the sum claimed for them. It is easy in this view to understand how nearly five-sixths of the woolen goods consumed in this country are home manufacture, and foreign competition nearly destroyed. After such an examination how sublime was the audacity which last winter reduced the duty on wool and then increased the duty on the manufactured product. These high duties have created the practice of stopping work when prices are unsatisfactory until any excess of supply over demand is cut off. In the mean time labor is either idle or partially employed. This is what is sometimes enthusiastically designated as preserving the home market for ourselves.

In my criticism on the duties prior to the law of 1883 I do not overlook the fact that under its operation they were changed. The modification has been sometimes to increase and then to slightly decrease them on the several items. They are too slight to avoid the application of what I have said to the present law. I have taken the old law as the basis of my observations, because statistical information under the new law is not yet fully accessible.

Let us look now at the cotton manufactures. The census shows that in the Eastern States, Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut have invested in this industry $156,754,690. The Middle States, composed of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland, have invested $31,014,759. The twelve Southern States have invested $17,375,897. Eight Western States have invested $3,135,000. The total capital invested is $208,280,346. It then appears that this capital is all in the six Eastern States except $51,525,656. Massachusetts owns $72,291,601; this exceeds by $20,770,945, all the capital so invested in all the States of the Union except the six designated as Eastern.

The value of the product in the Eastern States is $143,363,030; in the Middle States is $29,389,286; in the Southern States is $16,356,598; in the Western States is $2,981,196. It thus appears that while the total value of the cotton manufactures in 1880 was $192,090,110, all of this was produced in the six Eastern States except $48,727,072. Massachusetts alone produced $72,280,518 of the gross sum. We imported in 1880 goods valued at $31,285,306. The ad valorem rate of duty was 39.08 per cent. The duty collected was $12,227,103. Now, assuming that the home product was increased in value by the rate of duty and discount its value accordingly, and it would be $117,174,967, instead of $192,090,110, a clear bounty of $74,915,143. Of this last sum $61,711,582 would go to the six Eastern States. Massachusetts alone would get $28,192,913. Had this bounty gone into the Treasury we should have had there, instead of the sum stated, $87,142,246. I do not say the full price is always added to the duty. Overproduction at home will temporarily reduce the price. Then the factories abate their work, discharge their hands, or work on short time until the product equals the demand only, and then the higher rate returns. This is the normal condition.

Let us now briefly look at the manufactures of iron and steel. The total value of these products by the census of 1880 is $296,557,685. Of this Illinois, New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania produce $223,259,136, leaving $73,298,549 to be divided between thirty-four States. Georgia's product is valued at the insignificant sum of $900,850. The total import of these articles is valued at $53,998,266. Of this $24,175,547 is duty. The residue, $29,823,719, represents the value of the product, less than 11 per cent. of the consumption in this country. The average ad valorem duty on iron is 40.38 per cent. and on steel 49.57 per cent. Discount the value of the product 45 per cent. and you give to the manufacturers of iron and steel a bonus of $133,450,958. We will be told the whole duty is not added to the price. This is sometimes true, and sometimes the price is not increased by the full amount of the duty. Nevertheless the increase will average half this sum in times of distress from overproduction, and approach very nearly to it when the demand and supply equal each other. Mr. Adams's view on this subject, heretofore quoted, is very high authority.

I will not fatigue you further by the consideration of other industries. Suffice it to say that almost every article of necessity, convenience, or luxury which the people of this country use is increased in price to them by the tariff. The advocates of protection claim they ought to have the home market. If but few goods are imported because the duty is placed so high as to prevent it, then you get but a small revenue. Then your principal object is not revenue, but to take from the great body of the people to give to large manufacturers, under the plausible pretense of keeping the home market for Americans. The principal plea is that you must do this to elevate American labor above the pauper labor of Europe. This, it is claimed, can not be done except with a high tariff. England is a free-trade country. France and Germany are protective countries. The labor in England is much higher than in the two latter countries; yet England far outstrips them in manufacture. Demand and supply regulates the price of labor everywhere. Hence you find often that when the duty is raised the price of labor goes down. We are told that protection cheapens products. A plate-glass manufacturer, in a hearing before the Ways and Means Committee, illustrated this doctrine in this way. He said ten years ago plate-glass cost $2.50 a square foot. Home competition has brought it down to $1. When asked the price abroad he said he did not know.

The census report shows that in 1880 in Europe the consumer could buy it at 60 cents per square foot. Either this gentleman was very stupid or else he intended to deceive the committee by creating the impression that plate-glass was lower in this country than anywhere else. He thought, however, the reduction of the duty on this article of 20 per cent. would ruin him. Many gentlemen representing various industries were heard. They avowed also that home competition had reduced the price to the consumer instead of raising it. None of them could be induced to give the value of their products in foreign markets, so that a comparison could be made. You can not get that sort of information from your Bureau of Statistics nor your custom-house officials. The veil is purposely kept between you and the truth. It is passing strange that this information, which is so important to an intelligent consideration of the great question of revenue, should be concealed. It is idle to say that it can not be reached. Your customs appraisers must know it to collect duties where so great a part are ad valorem. Nothing but a change of administration will turn the light on this darkness.

These same gentlemen in urging the necessity of letting the tariff alone in the interest of American labor revealed some singular facts. They would commence by saying the labor in this article is, say, 66 per cent.; the value of the materials, 46. When told this could leave them no profit this would be the explanation: The raw material is valued and every other expense is charged to labor. In this is included taxes, insurance, repairs, salaries of high officials, &c. When asked for these salaries they invariably refused to give them. After materials and labor are paid then they said, "We must have a profit on our capital." When asked what their profits were they declined to give them. They wanted protection and yet concealed one of the elements necessary to demonstrate how much was needed. What a sham is thus exposed in this cry for the American laborer. When asked how much duty was necessary for them they would say, "We want to be let alone." This was all Oakes Ames wanted.

A story is told of a criminal who was exported to Australia for crime. In the course of years he bought large tracts of land for an almost nominal price. Later they were discovered to be rich in iron ore, and this made him the wealthiest man in that country. His income was estimated at $500,000 per year. A friend said to him, "You ought to thank the British Government for sending you here, as it has resulted in your being the richest man in Australia." "Ah," said he, "when in England I was a burglar by trade, and I could have made $2,000,000 in a single night. All I wanted was to be let alone."

Mr. Chairman, I am not a free-trader. I believe in getting revenue from importations. I believe, however, that we should not legislate to avoid revenue, to make rich men richer and poor men poorer, under the pretense of elevating the American laborer above the pauper labor of Europe and keeping the home market for ourselves. We ought to so legislate as ultimately to reach a revenue standard. This can not be done at once. So much capital has been invested in the various manufacturing industries that a sudden change of policy would produce great disaster. Our progress should be as slow as true caution requires. Five, ten, or twenty years may be needed to accomplish it. Yet it must be done. The struggle will be fierce and arduous. Manufacturers will sacrifice political alliances, form new ones, and use every device to hold what they have. It is an almost daily observation that if the Democratic party does not abandon the effort to reduce our tariff legislation we can not elect a President. We are told the manufacturers are powerful in their wealth, and this will be used against us and effectually. If politicians on such suggestions abandon the people the time will come when truer representatives will take their places and resume the contest. The people are interested more in just and equal laws than in who shall be President. I fear, sir, that it can be said now, the Presidency is bought and sold every four years. Let us be careful lest the popular mind should be imbued with this truth and come to distrust all authority.

I honor the man who by economy, industry, and enterprise accumulates wealth. He is a public benefactor. He encourages others by his example. Just legislation is his best safeguard. I pray that laws begotten of cupidity may not characterize this country. They can but alienate the people. What social tendency they may beget no man can foretell. We live in an age of wonderful mental activity. The steam-engine, the telegraph, the spirit of invention and inquiry are but so many illustrations of it. Who shall say what of good or evil is near at hand in the political thought of this nation? Who can say that some frenzy such as that of the French revolution may not in the life of men now living repeat its horrors in our fair land? Before its avenging spirit no man nor body of men nor military force can stand in successful defiance. In its overwhelming current it will bear all men, all ideas, all forces to its destination of horror. I have faith, sir, in the people. I believe they are capable of reforming abuses by constitutional methods manifested by fair discussion. The past has demonstrated it and furnishes hope for the years to come. The great civil war alone permitted the present high taxes. The party which holds power hereafter must do it by outstripping its opponent in their reduction. Sophisms and audacious statements may be obstructions in the way, but they will only give volume and power to the current of reform which can not be staid.

Mr. Hamilton, in the report already referred to, commends pecuniary bounties for many reasons, which would require too much time for recital here. This is especially adapted to encourage farm products, he says. It can not therefore be urged, if this distinguished political economist is to be the guide, that the producers of cotton or grain which contribute so much to home manufactures are not entitled to this kind of encouragement. As I represent a cotton-growing constituency, I ask your attention to the beneficial effects such a course would have on that industry. The cotton exports in 1883 are valued at $247,328,271. The American laborer is paid, including rations, 45 cents per day. The Egyptian laborer is paid 7 cents per day, out of which he pays for his own food. One-third of $247,328,271 represents labor and is equal to $82,442,723. Now, to put the American laborer on an equal footing with the pauper labor of Egypt you must give the American producer six times this sum, $494,656,338. Deduct the $82,442,723 from that, and a clear bounty of $412,213,615 would be the bounty less the labor. This would be $164,885,344 more than the value of the exports. The home consumption, which is one-third of the product, has not been considered in this calculation, and if done would increase the bounty in the same proportion. Lands would advance two and three fold in value. Great areas now unoccupied would attract millions of people to the South. The laborer would be elevated in comforts, intelligence, and morals to a higher standard than any in the world. The manufacturer would get his raw material cheaper, and so supply all the cotton fabrics at a cheaper rate to all of our consumers. We should soon destroy the production of cotton in every other country and increase our export item in this article alone to an almost fabulous sum.

The South once had slave labor. This annual bonus would equal more than five times the value of her slave labor. She would grow richer in one decade than she did from her settlement to 1860. She, too, might become haughty and fancy it was due to her superiority over the people of other sections of the Union. In a few years she might claim this bonus a benefit to every other section, and feel enraged whenever her opinion was questioned. She might soon control the Federal Government by the power which wealth brings to a continuance of this policy. She might abandon all devotion to that Constitution which sought to restrain Federal power. Ay, she would hasten, I fear, to accept broader constructions of that instrument than Hamilton in all his love of Federal power ever dreamed of. This same policy extended to the grain-growing regions would have like effect, but I forbear entering further on the subject of bounties to farmers. I know the protected manufacturer is already impatient. I know he is ready to denounce all this as worse than nonsense, and sees in it naught but an attack on his industries. Although it is pregnant with equity and justice, this does not reach his judgment or conscience, but stirs his hatred and scorn. On the contrary, he says of him: "He ought not to be allowed to trade with any one save ourselves. He ought to be compelled by law to buy our products, though he may have to pay twice as much as the Englishman or Frenchman or German would charge him, and though these same people must buy his surplus farm products, or else it is only fit for fuel." This is their idea of equality before the law. This is their idea of republican institutions. This intent, they would have you believe, was present with our fathers when they formed and adopted the present Constitution.

Mr. Chairman, I have often heard protectionists denouncing men who represented agricultural sections and who opposed high tariffs because of the burdens imposed by them on farmers. They have declared them too feeble in intelligence to see beyond their own locality, and too narrow in patriotism to comprehend the varied pursuits of a great people. How misdirected this scorn! Because the farmer sees himself compelled to pay in a thousand forms tribute to men of large capital, invested in manufacturing industries, and is discontented at this quasi-slavery and desires a reformation in legislation which contemplates justice to all men, he is to be called stupid and unpatriotic. This pharisaical cant from selfish men is deserving only of the return of contempt from every one who regards the rights of his neighbor. The manufacturer seems to think the people and the Government were intended only for him. He is ever calling for legislative aid. He has so far succeeded. Agriculture is staggering all over this land from these burdens. Thrust yourself athwart his views and he threatens the use of the elective franchise and of his ill-gotten gains to defeat your party at the ballot-box. He organizes in great associations and boasts that he can make or unmake the political fortunes of public men for the highest offices in the land. He has dictated to Congress and the President already a tariff commission in his own interest. He clings to its iniquitous results with all the fierceness of "the mountain cat who guards her young." His opponents are stupid and narrow-minded or in the pay of England. They are getting British gold.

I have no unkind feeling toward any industry in this land. I would infuse into each of them tenfold more of life if I could by willing it. But, sir, I will not subscribe to a policy which impoverishes the great mass of our people engaged in agriculture to enrich sections engaged principally in making cotton or woolen or iron manufactures, even though, forsooth, some part of them are located in my own State. The health of our Constitution and the permanence of our institutions depend on the dignity and prosperity of our rural population. Give to them an equal chance to prosper by equal laws. Let that prosperity hold our young men to the farms. Stay in this way their drift to city life. Thus you will do more than in any other to make our nation sober, thoughtful, conservative, and happy. Our great cities have been aptly termed sores on the body politic. They are the hot-beds of vice, crime, and revolution. While commerce and manufactures necessarily create them, the evil they contain may be subjected to control always if the pure blood of healthy country life is rightly guarded by lofty statesmanship.

Mr. Chairman, the pending bill is liable to several criticisms. It is alleged that it fails to correct inequalities in the present law. I answer, the committee did not undertake to do this. It was thought best to make a simple and partial reduction of taxes, that a multiplicity of issues would tend to create confusion in the public mind and so lessen the moral force which has compelled and will continue to drive the high protectionists to a gradual abandonment of war taxes. The gross inequalities under the act of 1864 were permitted to remain by the Republican party until 1883, a period of nineteen years. That party preferred them to the hazards of legislation. It made a horizontal reduction of 10 per cent. in 1872, and a horizontal increase of 10 per cent. in 1875. The discussion of the tariff policy of that party in 1876 and 1880 so affected the public mind as to force it to take up the question for reduction and revision. Even a Republican President found it necessary to urge the subject upon Congress. The bill of 1883 was passed, and of course a large part of the inequalities and incongruities which had been permitted to exist were corrected in the opinion of that body. A horizontal method now is not so objectionable, therefore, as it was when adopted for reducing duties in 1872, or for increase of duties in 1875.

I submit that the country will not consider this point as conclusive against the pending bill, but rather the evidence of a partisanship which assaults everything indiscriminately coming from its opponents. A revision covering every dutiable article, no matter how wise, would have been unacceptable to the Republican party and would have made their efforts to confuse the public more easy of success.

It is said the agitation of the tariff will depress the industries of the country which were adjusting themselves to the new law. Are the manufactories of the land the only industries? With all the advantages of a protective policy under any law of indirect taxation are we to be restrained from reducing that taxation because it disturbs the protected classes? Have they become so imbued with the belief that they must be fostered by the General Government that the public good is to be found only in the horizon of their own wants?

In the report of the minority the declaration is made that no one demands this legislation except free-traders. This brings my mind to the scenes in the committee room. One gentleman would say, "I am here to represent an association for textile machinery, with a capital of $50,000,000;" another, that he represented ———, with so much capital; and so on and on marched in review the advocates of the interest of capital told by millions, tens, twenties, thirties, forties, fifties, &c. They either wanted the law let alone or some duty increased. Occasionally they would bring some laboring man from their works to give confidence to their pretense of friendship for American labor. A few gentlemen from Brooklyn and New York connected with free-trade clubs asked and obtained a hearing. The first class wanted to put money in their pockets, the latter to advocate a theory. The committee did not accept the views of either, nor indorse them. The great multitude which not only supplies this country but exports many hundreds of millions of products in corn, wheat, cotton, meats, &c., so far as the committee could know from the speeches made, had no one to urge or oppose the present bill. Unfortunately, the farmers of this country do not come to Congress through organizations designed to influence legislation. But, sir, are they unrepresented? Do the great body of the representatives of the people here know nothing of the wants of their constituents? Is the House of Representatives a sham? Sir, members of this body know as well as any one can what is the public need, and they have every interest in correctly stating it and legislating to meet it. The men who came before the Ways and Means Committee had great pecuniary interests to tempt them to misstatements and deception. No man who listened to them could fail to feel like Burns:

> For a' mankind are unco weak and little to be trusted;
> If self the wavering balance shake, it's rarely right adjusted.

No lawyer as he has seen the selfish coloring of witnesses in their cause ever pitied the weakness of humanity more than that committee must have done in these hearings. Such men were on the Tariff Commission, and such generally were the men who gave information to them on which the present law was based. Is it wonderful that they should oppose Congressional action except through a commission? Is it wonderful that they should say Congress did not have sense enough to legislate on the tariff? Sir, with an honest purpose to do right no body of men can fail to improve the present burdensome legislation.

Again, sir, we are told that a reduction of the rate of taxation will bring more money than the present law. This would at first seem paradoxical. But the explanation can be made in one way only. The present law is so high as to exclude foreign goods from our markets, or to limit the importations so that few of them will be brought here. The 20 per cent. reduction will admit more of them and so furnish more objects of taxation. This will create more competition in the market, and the consumer will get cheaper goods. Yes, sir; it is seriously said by the minority the Government will get more taxes and inferentially the people get all the necessities and comforts of life for less money if the 20 per cent. reduction is adopted. What a calamity! If this bill becomes a law and experience ratifies this prediction, the American people will want more of the evil. Their taste can easily be perverted to this heresy in political economy. They do not want the taxing power changed into one to foster monopolies to feed on their substance. Clamor, clamor, confusion, audacity, deception, and a suborned press must be summoned to battle against such a dire heresy. To reduce the revenues by increasing taxes is the battle cry. Thus the body of the people can be made to believe their burdens are light while the manufacturer is despoiling them with a rapacity worse than that of an invading army. The latter plunders and retires, while the former will ravage for centuries, by day and by night, without sympathy, remorse, or satiety.

It is said the results of the act of March, 1883, can not be appreciated until more time has elapsed. This criticism has a small measure of truth in it. Enough is known to satisfy every one that the rate of reduction is small. The following table, prepared at the Bureau of Statistics, fully sustains this statement:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS, March 10, 1884.

JOSEPH NIMMO, JR., Chief of Bureau.

The lessening of duties under the new law restrained importations until it went into operation on July 1 and facilitated them where there was an increase. This would be the natural result. And yet we find the largest falling off of importations on iron and steel and the manufactures thereof under a reduction of 5.68 per cent. ad valorem. The contrary result ought to have come from protection theories. From this tabular statement it is manifest that the reduction of the tariff under the last law is very trifling and leaves it nearly at war rates. The friends of that law stilled the popular complaint against it by avowing reductions which no man will now claim for it, and we are told to wait and see exactly what they are to be. This cry is intended for delay. The Committee on Ways and Means so believing, and knowing that the reductions originally claimed for the law are untrue, urged by a sense of justice to the people, propose to make moderate but substantial reductions by the bill they report.

It is said the reduction of duties will lower the rate of wages. I assert that no statement has come from the State Department, from the manufacturers, from any branch of the Federal Government, nor from any State government which in relation to the conditions of labor in Europe and America is not baldly deceptive. In both countries labor is regulated by the market and not by legislation. In labor trade is absolutely free. If American labor was in so much better condition than in Europe how soon would our land be filled with foreign labor and work equality? We actually receive small accessions to our population from free-trade England. Our largest are from protective Germany. Emigration to the United States continues under high and
